Grant, a Queen's graduate in Geography who has experience with Community groups, has been on the job about three weeks. If the "roughly twenty-five applicants" to the job, says Wilson, she was the one was the one who best fitted the AMS executive's criterion of a "reasonable level of experience, anility with quantitative methods of research as well as interpretive skills, the academic background, personality and knowledge of politics."

Right now Grant is doing an extensive research project in the form of a survey on where students live. "The information gathered will be used for such things as: "Bus-it evaluation and perhaps to form a student's tenant group." The idea, says Wilson, is to "evaluate the present feeling that students must live farther and farther away from the campus due to housing shortages." The AMS wants to find out whether this "pressure is fact or fiction by comparing the results with patterns of five years ago."

Grant has already completed a study of the accessibility of a university education According to Wilson, the purpose was to discover "just which students get to university."

The next project will take a close look at the Queen's Library system and the feasibility of the branch system Particular questions to be answered are "What services are offered?" What numbers are served?" Matters of "staffing responsibility for various sections and costs" will be researched.

Both Grant and Wilson hope to see the job established on a permanent basis Wilson recognizes that he "can't bind other Councils" but hopes that future Councils will rehire the assistant as an "aid in making their political arguments more credible." For the time being, Grant will continue to do research into a number of areas, primarily those of "student support and academic issues at Queen's, both of which are long term projects." Other issues for research can be submitted to Wilson by any student and will be "judged equally on their merits"

Berger to speak Tuesday

Mr. Justice Tom Berger, commissioner for the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry, will deliver the second Corry Lecture at Queen's University on Tuesday, Nov. 25, 1975.

The lecture, which will be open to the university community and the public, is entitled "The Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry", and will focuse on the royal commission as a method of inquiry and its effectiveness in informing governments. The presentation will take place in Dunning Hall Auditorium at 3:30 p.m.

Judge Berger, a graduate of the University of British Columbia, was called to the Bar of British Columbia in 1957. He practised law in Vancouver from 1957 to 1971, when he was made judge of the province's Supreme Court.

From 1962 to 1963, Judge Berger was member of parliament (NDP) for Vancouver-Burrard, and he represented the same riding for three years (1968-69) in the provincial legislature

In 1973, the B.C. government named him chairman of the Royal Commission on Family and Children's Law. The fragmented aspects of family law were brought together in one institutional framework as a result of this mandate.

Before he was appointed to the bench Judge Berger represented native groups in asserting their hunting, fishing and aboriginal rights in cases before the court.

Judge Berger will be at Queen's for three days, during which time he will participate in seminars and meetings with students and faculty

The inaugural Corry Lecture was given last fall by Prof William R Mackenzie of Glasgow University, a distinguished scholar and government advisor The lecture bears the name of Queen's University's principal from 1961 to 1968, James Alexander Corry Dr Corry is a professor emeritus of the Political Studies government and political science

Queen's loss

The Queen's Student Health Service lost one of its valuable staff members last Sunday in the death of Dr. James Hitsman.

Students of medicine at Queen's may remember him better as a lecturer Dr Hitsman returned to teach at the same school from which he graduated in 1943.

Hitsman served as a colonel in the Canadian Army. He commanded a field dressing station in Korea during 1951 and 1952. This valorous service earned Hitsman the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire

The loss of Dr. Hitsman will be keenly felt by his associates and the entire Queen's community.

ft's the only way to fly

Get home cheaply: learn to fly now

Dave Raymond

Can you imagine where you will be three weeks from now? Either crushed by the mob in the Voyageur bus terminal or shivering on the windswept CNR platform waiting for the "Lakeshore"? Perhaps as you huddle there, contemplating your miserable condition, your eyes will be cast heaven-ward, and, if it isn't raining, you may catch a glimpse of a small aeroplane soaring through the azure air. By air Ottawa would be about an hour away. Toronto would be a little longer, and North Bay a mere two hours. Just a dream you say? So expensive that it could only be enjoyed by the idle rich? Nonsense! You can fly home this Christmas via Kingston Air Services. I recently talked with Max Greenwood, chief flying instructor at Kingston Air Services, for the CFRC new program Overview, about his views on flying and learning how to fly.

To begin with, I should point out that Kingston does have an aerodrome, the Norman Rogers Memorial Airport, which can be reached by travelling three miles out of the city on King Street West. The aerodrome is on your right and Kingston Air Services is located on the west side of the field. Mr. Greenwood told me that K.A.S. offers a variety of services, including maintenance, charter flying, and instruction. The charter service is good for anywhere in North America and can be ready at an hour's notice. There is a flat rate for this service, so that it will cost the same whether one person or eight go on a flight. For example eight people can fly to Windsor in two hours, at a rate of twelve cents a mile, and, as one is going in a small-sized aeroplane, you can land at a small aerodrome, rather than a major one, which could be closer to your destination.

Many of you might be interested in taking the controls of an aeroplane yourself. Mr. Greenwood noted that flying instruction is the largest service that K.A.S. runs. To find out if you really like flying, K.A.S. offers a five dollar introductory flight, "a sort of mini-lesson" according to Mr. Greenwood, in which you can have twenty minutes of flight instruction with no obligation. To get a flying license, there being a choice between an operator's or a commercial license as there is in driving, one must have thirty-five hours of flying time and twenty hours of ground school. One can book flight lessons at K.A.S. while ground school is held at St. Lawrence College. The cost of a commercial license is roughly equivalent to one year of university away from home. Unlike university, I was told, a commercial pilot's license practically assures you of a job. Flying lessons are tax deductable and it is generally less expensive to learn in Eastern Ontario than anywhere else in the province.

No born pilots

Max Greenwood asserted that there is no such thing as a "born pilot". His classes include people from all walks of life, aged from sixteen to sixty. There is no great need to have some technical knowledge as all that is necessary will be taught at ground school. Flying is a useful trade, there being a demand for instructors, bush pilots, or corporate pilots. It is quite possible to become an airline pilot with the training one receives at K.A.S. In fact the airlines prefer pilots with a university education. Queen's students and faculty have become involved with K.A.S., a second year economics student is an instructor, a commerce student does charter flights, and there are a number of professors on staff.

My entire interview with Max Greenwood will be heard on this week's Overview, Saturday at seven on both CFRC AM and FM. Remember when it gets closer to vacation time should one of your friends come to you and say, "Come fly with me" they do not necessarily mean a red hot night in Belleville but a fast and inexpensive way to get home and away from Queen's.

Branch library fines are now a possibility

At the most recent Senate Library Committee meeting, Thursday, November 13, a notice of motion was made by the Chief Librarian. The motion is comprised of two components:

- that the Senate Library Committee endorse the extension of uniform library fines to all units and branches of the library system
- that the Senate Library Committee endorse the principle of charging library users the cost of any direct charge made for inter-library loan service or copies by lending libraries.

In reference to the first part of the motion, it has become necessary to standardize the "fines procedures" of the branch libraries with those in operation within the Douglas Library. More specifically, the reserve material has not been returned at the designated time thus inconveniencing other students. A system which could function without fines would be agreeable with everyone however this had netted disappointing results in the past.

With regards to the second part of the motion, Queen's University has access to the libraries of all the universities in Ontario and Quebec with the exception of Laurentian and Lakehead which pose transportation problems. The books are delivered via the inter University Transit System (I.U.T.S., which consists of automobile transport. The actual transport fee is funded by an annual contribution from each participating university. It is more economical and greater resources can be provided through temporarily borrowing as opposed to purchasing.

In past years the students have not been required to pay a user's fee except to cover the cost of photocopied material. Students would now be required to pay a "user's fee" of five dollars per loaned book.

If the university could absorb the costs of loans by increasing funds to the library system students would not be asked to pay this fee. However, the provincial government could more easily absorb the costs due to their financial position. The Council of Ontario Universities (COU) is the organization who could make this recommendation to the provincial government.

It is interesting to note that the Queen's Library System is presently composed of approximately over one million books. When the Library receives complaints of this nature from faculty and students they are in no situation financially to accept the responsibility of fulfilling every individual's needs. A large percentage of the materials is not being utilized. In one year, forty to fifty thousand books are used once and only ten to twenty thousand are read frequently. Perhaps the faculty and students at Queen's could investigate what material is provided within their own library before the research topics are decided upon. In times of constraint we have to learn to meet our demands with what is already provided.

This motion will be presented at the next Senate meeting which is Nov. 27th at 3:30 p.m. in the Collins Room at Richardson Hall. If you have any questions or comments with regards to this motion, please direct them to the following student members of the Senate Library Committee: Tom Maich (546-1951), Kirk Patterson (546-9743), or Jane Toller (546-7474).

Gow Memorial Lectures

Housing in Canada

"Housing in Canada" is the topic of the 1975 Donald Gow Memorial Lecture to be presented by the Queen's University School of Public Administration on Saturday, November 22. William Teron, President of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will be the guest speaker at this second annual public lecture.

Prior to his appointement to CMHC in 1973, Mr. Teron, a past member of the Canadian Housing Design Council, and the Science Council of Canada Committee on Urban Development, was well known for his achievements as a designer, planner and private developer in the housing and urban development fields.

Mr. Teron's luncheon address will be followed by a panel discussion with Eli Comay of Comay Planning Consultants Ltd., Dr. John Holmes, of Queen's Geography Department, and George Cook, Deputy Commissioner of Development for the City of Toronto.

This event is designed to draw together people from diverse backgrounds with an interest in Canadian public administration. Such interchanges were a matter of deep concern to Donald Gow, who was the first director of the Queen's School of Public Administration, serving from 1970 to 1973. After Dr. Gow's death in 1973, students, friends and associates established the annual lecture as a memorial to him to focus on important aspects of Canadian public policy.

Tickets for the lecture and luncheon ($10 per person) may be obtained from the Queen's Alumni Association Office at 547-5706. For further information, contact Cheryl Baudoux, 547-2880.

Beyond the Books

Claim settled

Last week, settlement was reached in the James Bay dispute. This settlement is the first agreement with native peoples in Canada which recognizes aboriginal rights. The dispute centred around the James Bay hydro-electric project and its effects upon the culture of the Cree and Inuit peoples of Northern Quebec. The five years of dispute, included the longest injunction hearing in Canadian legal history, which resulted in a temporary stoppage of work on the project. The decision was overturned in 6 days and work was allowed to continue with no consideration for the native peoples. We think this lack of consideration is characteristic of the Quebec government's attitude towards aboriginal rights.

The native peoples settled for payments of $225 million over 20 years from the Federal government, Quebec government and royalties from the James Bay Energy Corporation (JBEC). The Crees accepted exclusive rights to 2,095 square miles of land and the Inuit accepted 3,250 square miles. The project area encompasses 410,000 square miles. The native peoples also receive certain vague rights in determining how the rest of the land is to be used. In return for these concessions the Cree and Inuit agree to relinquish all island claims.

Buckle up!

Tuesday, the Ontario government announced that it will make wearing seat belts mandatory for drivers and passengers on highways, as of January 1. The province will also reduce speed limits on its freeways from 70 m.p.h. to 60 m.p.h. The date that the speed limit change is to take effect was not announced. Premier Davis said the measures were taken to conserve gasoline, saves and reduce medical costs.

Nations agree

Leaders at the six nation economic summit reached agreement on goals for world trade and currency exchange rates. Finance ministers of the six countries; United States, France, Britain, West Germany, Italy and Japan; stated that they will be issuing a joint statement to be known as the Rambouillet Manifesto. At the conference the U.S. suggested reductions of quotas and tariffs, elimination of trade barriers for certain goods; special treatment for developing nations and improvements in trade rules governing agriculture. An agreement on currency rates might include setting limits within which currency values could fluctuate in world money markets.

United Way gets a boost

The ASUS Art Sale held October 27 to November 2 has given the Queen's United Way campaign a big boost towards their goal. The aim of the United Way committee is to raise $4000 from the students of the Queen's community. The profits of the Art Sale, $1002, were donated to the United Way in a ceremony in front of the target board by Douglas Library. The committee are now convinced that the generous donation of ASUS will provide the momentum needed to achieve their objective.

Outing Club off to great start

The Queen's Outing Club is a very informal group of people at Queen's with the common bond of an interest in hiking, biking, tripping, skiing and just getting into the out-of-doors. Part of its function is getting people together to plan and organize trips to anywhere: from Wolfe Island to the Rockie Mountains. Another purpose of the Club is to provide members with low cost and good quality camping equipment. One of the benefits of the club is the sharing of expertise and experience: persons with ability in one area help those with interest in their field and vice versa.

Some of the trips held already this year by the Club include two hiking trips to the Adirondacks and two canoe trips in Algonquin Park. Another canoe trip and two cross-country ski trips are already in the works for the near future.

The Outing Club meets Mondy nights in the SMU second floor common room at 7:30 pm. Starting this coming Monday each meeting will have a film or speaker of interest. Monday December 1 will feature a cross-country ski seminar with advice on the car, buying and waxing of skis.

"Invitation to Live" crusade begins

Professors from Memorial University in Newfoundland and the University of Western Ontario in London, Ont., will be among the members of the Invitation to Live Crusade team when it arrives here next week.

Daily sessions with university students will be among the programs of the crusade team which will meet with civic and fraternal organizations and groups, with teachers and businessmen and in neighbourhood fellowship meetings.

The Invitation to Live Crusade meetings are scheduled each evening at Kingston Memorial Centre from November 23 to 30.

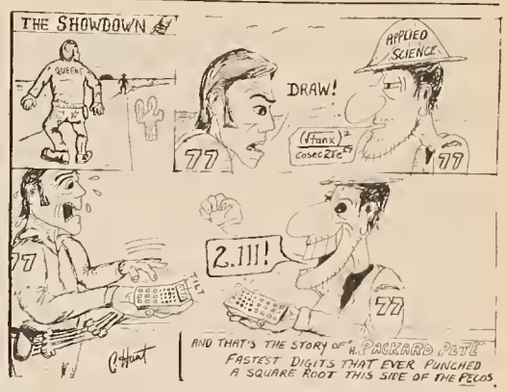
Rev. Marney Patterson, director of Invitation to Live Crusades, will address each gathering. An interdenominational 300 voice choir composed of membership from Kingston area churches will provide the music.

Close to 40 churches have become involved in the crusade planning and scores of others within commuting distance have been invited to participate in the crusade.

Crusade chairman is Rev. Burry Wiseman of Princess Street United Church. Chairmen of the committees come from the Anglican, Roman Catholic, Baptist, United, Presbyterian, Missionary Alliance and Free Methodist churches, the Salvation Army and the Christian Union.

The ministry to campuses will be one of the major focal points of the crusade program.

Dr. Taylor, a professor of biophysics at Western University, is faculty advisor to the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship.



Another person whgo will augment the crusade team will be Canon Desmond Hunt, formerly of Kingston, now rector of the Church of the Messiah (Anglican) in Toronto. Canon Hunt will lead daily luncheon meetings with Kingston area businessmen. Canon Hunt's wife, Naomi, will also be present to minister to women in household coffee hours.

The crusade is not the first in eastern Ontario for the Invitation to Live team. Other such meetings have been held in Brockville, Trenton, Madoc, Smiths Falls and Camden East in recent years.

In his nine years as a full-time evangelist, Mr. Patterson has conducted crusades throughout Canada and the United States, in Jamaica, the Philippines and Japan.

Mr. Patterson will also conduct workshops for clergy and laity during the crusade week. On Saturday, November 29th, a "Carpenter's Workshop" will be held for laymen and women on sharing the Christian faith.

A "Church Alive" workshop for clergy to assist in congregational evangelism will also be part of the eight day crusade program.

Demands met after long protest

MONTREAL (CUP)--Striking Universite de Montreal sociology students decided November 7 to accept an administration proposal which met most of their demands following a three month protest concerning teaching methods.

The proposal includes a pilot project allowing the students to participate in research projects chosen by students and a promise to work for more student participation in the university's administration

University rector Paul Lacost warned the projects would only supplement the present curriculum, and should not be considered an "open door" or a precedent for other departments.

Lacost said the university will allow students to make up time lost during the nine-week protest, and will not request an extension of an injunction barring picketing on campus, provided "there are no further disruptions of university life."

Join the battle against world hunger

James Avis

"A true revolution of values will soon look uneasily on the glaring contrast of poverty and wealth...and say this is not just." Martin Luther King.

Canadians have often expressed their concern for people in need and share a common commitment to simple justice. To give expression to this commitment, the AMS Education Commission and OXFAM-Canada have set Thursday, January 15 as a day for Queen's University students and faculty to contemplate the universal problem of world hunger. By choosing hunger for a day, or even by missing a meat, you can make a statement of concern for the world's overlooked majority. For those wishing to make a more concrete expression of concern, we are asking that students donate the costs of any missed meals to OXFAM-Canada

Each year the rural people, who make up most of the Earth's population produce more than a billion metric tons of grain Each year the crop is eaten, but not everyone's hunger is satisfied.

Last year's World Food Conference in Rome estimated that there were 460 million severely malnourished people in the world - one eighth of the world's population. That total is expected to increase to 750 million by 1985. Death rates are already rising in several underdeveloped countries, with malnutrition as one of the most significant causes. Why? Crop failures, rising oil prices, rampant inflation in the prices of machinery, fertilizers and other inputs from industrialized nations unjust trade patterns, and profiteering by multinational corporations and local elites all contribute to poverty and increased food costs. The result is starvation.

The World Bank estimates that there are perhaps a billion small farmers, many of whom produce largely or entirely food for their own families. They are the key to solving the world's food crisis. In North America, where the average farmer can feed 46 people besides himself, people usually think of small-scale labour-intensive farms as inefficient. In poor nations this is not the case. Small farmers overseas, using labour-intensive methods, have equalled or surpassed per acre production in North America. Co-operative methods of cultivation and marketing, new seed varieties, proper fertilization and adequate water, and access to credit to obtain these inputs can result in dramatic yield increases. Coupled with genuine land reform, such technical and social innovations could be the basis of self-sufficiency in food production and a solution to the world food crisis.

"We cannot rely on the outside world to protect us from famine; we must rely on ourselves." - Farmer, Orissa State, India.

In the long run, the poor and hungry in underdeveloped nations must depend for their food upon the harvest of their own farmers. This is why OXFAM has given its highest priority to helping small farmers to grow more food for their own families and for their own neighbours and countrymen. By putting funds into agricultural co-operatives and other community-based projects such things as credit unions, water management, better seed, fertilizers, and village level health care become possible through the efforts of the people themselves.

If people are starving, it is only a partial response to provide food. It is necessary to ask why hunger has occurred and work to prevent its happening again. By contributing to OXFAM, you can have a part in supporting practical objectives.

OXFAM-Canada exists to combat hunger, poverty, disease, injustice, and inequality in the world. The AMS believes that Queen's students support this objective and we are satisfied that OXFAM-Canada is a suitable agency for students to support. Future articles will outline some specific OXFAM projects and give further details of the January 15 fast day.

Smoke

So what can you do?

Michael Walker

"Researchers have calculated that 68 percent of the smoke from a burning cigarette goes into the environment and the amounts from cigar and pipe smoke are even higher Researchers have also found that smoking 7 cigarettes in t hour, even in a ventilated room, creates carbon monoxide levels of 90 parts per million for the person next to the smoker This level represents almost twice the maximum set for industry! Even after a person leaves the smokey environment, it takes hours for the carbon monoxide to leave the body. Other noxious compounds in smoke to which the non-smoker is subjected are: Tar and nicotine, 3-4 benzpyrene, which is suspected as a cancer-causing agent; amonia and cadmium which is being investigated as one of the compounds in cigarette smoke which damages the air sacs of the lungs and causes emphysema. Studies indicate that high levels of carbon monoxide in the blood prevent people from distinguishing relative brightness, and they lose some ability to judge time intervals and take longer to respond to taillights. They also show impaired performance on psychomotor tests. Parents who smoke at home can aggravate symptoms in asthmatic children and even trigger an asthmatic attack".

So what can you do?

1) Express your discomfort when smokers light up without permission, and ask them to stop:

2) Ask your professors and department heads to put up "no smoking" signs in your classroom.

3) Ask your professors to ban smoking in your classrooms

4) Introduce and support no smoking resolutions at all meetings

5) Write, phone, or go and see department heads, faculty deans, and members of the senate, and ask for a ban on smoking.

Copeland

Brian Copeland

It was impossible for John Gray to withdraw voluntarily from the Faculty of Arts and Science because the Faculty never received a registration form from Gray for 1975-76. This has been confirmed by Associate Dean Platineus. Other highly reliable sources have confirmed that John Gray was required by his Facutty to withdraw permanently from the university, on Friday October 10 after he had announced to the Outer Council that he had withdrawn voluntarily.

For John, there can only be heartfelt sorrow that his academic future has been sacrificed for student government. It can only serve as a strong reminder to other student politicians that academics should be a student's first priority.

The Gray Affair began in the summer of 1975 when Peter Druxerman, former Vice-President (Operations) reported that Gray felt strongly about not coming back to Queen's in the Fall. It appears that Gray knew during the summer that unless he finished his course work from the Fall-Winter Session, he would not be back at Queen's as a student. Time was against Gray when he returned in September, for he had to get Outer Council support, and student body support behind him before he was forced into a position of having to withdraw as a student, which Gray realized would mean an election. Oct. 9 was critical because, the next day, Oct. 10, he would no longer be a student, and so having solid support Gray played his cards before Outer Council at the Thursday meeting of Oct. 9. He won the first round, as Nordheimer urged Council to overturn the Speaker's ruling of an unconstitutional President, and the Outer Council backed Gray solidly

Then came the AMS Court, a factor that Gray had not entirely counted on. His defence failed and Gray lost round two. His council Ian Nordheimer was defending himself as much as he was defending Gray, for Nordheimer feared an election like the plague, if Gray were forced to resign as President.

Round three was at the General Meeting of November 8. By now only five days after the Court's decision, the tables had switched and Nordheimer was on the offensive. The Atkinson motion at the Nov. 6 Outer Council meeting was the key. It allowed Nordheimer to become President without an election, and remember that he was acclaimed, not elected, to his position as Vice-President. The Collins' motions were soundly defeated, which was a necessity if Nordheimer was to become President. They would have put John Gray back into the game, and forced an election in all probability. But the Atkinson motion won approval.

Then on November 13, in what was an anti-climactic move, Nordheimer announced that it was recommended to the Outer Council that he become President, and Paul Steep, a political novice, become Vice-President (Operations). Outer Council entirely sick of the whole mess surrounding the 'Gray Affair', accepted Nordheimer's recommendations.

Ian is welt qualified and should prove to be an excellent President. But in the final analysis of the Gray Affair, there is only one conclusion; Ian Nordheimer won, and John Gray lost.

Abuse of women: fiction or not?

One View: A friend and I went to a local drinking establishment I was desperately lonely for my family. Eight months previously, I had been deposited in this foreign land, Canada was supposed to be a place of equal opportunity, but I had yet to see any demonstration of it. I still hadn't picked up much of the language.

Anyway, we were having a couple of drinks and watching the girls at the next table. They were free enough with the waiters I tried to engage one of them in conversation. Teasing bitch that she was, she answered my initial, innocent question with a curt answer, and turned around again I went to their table and tried to speak to them, tried to tell them that I was Portuguese and couldn't yet speak their language very well They paid attention with about half of their concentration. One kept insisting that she was watching the hockey game. I told them that I wanted no trouble. When the waiter came past, t bought them each a beer over their weak protests.

While one of them was gone from the table for a moment, I went to the bar to buy potato chips. As I returned to the table, the waiter told me to sit at my own table, told me that the young ladies didn't want me at their table.

I turned quickly, not comprehending, and knocked the arm that held a tray of drinks. A full bottle and an empty glass fell to the floor. With the noise, the attention of the pub was immediately riveted on the two tables.

I sat down quietly, seething. I had told them I wanted no trouble. Why did they tell the waiter to send me away? I was just reaching out for friendship. I learned that night that the young WASP ladies of Canada thought themselves too good for me."

Another View: "My friends from work were with me at a pub last Saturday night. We were drinking, eyeing the scenery, watching the Montreal Canadiens on T.V. Suddenly, there was a crashing of glass behind us. Seems a couple of girls had been drinking and some guy had bought them a couple of beer. One of them asked the waiter to make the guy leave. Apparently he'd been getting aggressive. When the waiter gave him the word, he turned angrily and knocked the waiter's tray to the floor.

She asked for it, of course. Any broad that would let a stranger buy her a drink deserves whatever she gets. She was lucky. All she got was a little attention. How could anybody who is old enough to drink be so naive as to think that the guy just wanted someone to talk to?

Both of the witnesses to the incident judged the women in the scenarios to be the cause of the trouble, the ones at fault. Because they went to a bar, unescorted, they were assumed to be on the prowl. It is sadly typical of our society that in such a situation, the women are damned if they do, and damned if they don't.

Is the 'university' slipping on the banana peel of moral bankruptcy?

The evils of university education

by Larry Fisk
Canadian University Press
adapted from the chevron, waterloo

We live in a time of such social awareness that even the graffiti scribbled on the washroom walls has taken on moral and political significance. One such popular scrawl reminds us that Frederick Nietszche was probably the first to coin the "God is dead" phrase. It reads "God is Dead--Fred" and below it are emblazed the words "Fred is Dead!--God."

A group of students at the University of Alberta were recently addressed by a speaker who entitled his talk: "The University is dead – God."

Some of us would be prepared to argue that in terms of matters that really count, the university, if it isn't dead, is at least under the serious and critical scrutiny of experts in the intensive care unit and the present prognosis is none too favourable. For, whatever else we may wish to say about the youth culture (or however we define the long term significance of a counter-culture or cultural revolution) a profound questioning and dissatisfaction is in fact being expressed and changes demanded within the university environment. Perhaps Peter Berger's simple explanation helps us to understand. The dominant spirit of childhood:-- the happy childhood that most middle class children share is confronting the second most dominant spirit, in technological societies:--the spirit of bureaucratization common to all institutions. The carefree, protected and highly regulated and impersonal life of bureaucracy first of all in educational institutions.

Social institutions like the church or the family, or political institutions like political parties may once have been the most logical object of youthful attack but their significance in defining social reality seems very much to be replaced by the universitites. Hence, the attack zeroes in on the more recently uncovered enemy.

Berger's notion of these two dominant spirits leaves much unexplained:--for example, why should this present generation act so determinedly when some of us sat so passively in lecture halls only a decade ago? Nevertheless the above comments do open at least, the question as to how the university defines social reality and what myths are operative as the university engages in this vital task. The problem, as we understand it, is not so much that the university has the power to define social reality for us but, rather, that it does so on the basis of very particular, if not narrow, assumptions rooted in its present faculty and administration and their own professional training; most of whom fail to recognize the particularities of their own myth-making.

We see three evil tendencies in university education in Canada. Universities seem to us to be increasingly antipersonal, politically reactionary and morally bankrupt. We describe these evils as tendencies because we do not believe all universities harbour them to the same extent although all halls of learning are subjected to the forces which foster their unwelcome growth. These forces include, we're convinced, tightly rationalized academic traditions, the social status of the University-trained, the effect of large buildings and the maintenance of them, the sheer size of most modern campuses and their concommitant administrative needs, and the increased importance and power of universities in social and political life. Emanations arising from the above sources inevitably push the university in the undesirable directions which we now wish to describe more fully.

Anti-Personal

First we said the university tends to be anti-personal. We deliberately chose to say "anti-personal" rather than "impersonal" because our first expression intimates that university life is consciously against people rather than quietly indifferent. Let us explain.

It is obvious now to most of us that the university is increasingly anti-personal when we consider the bureaucratization of the institution. Scores of introductory classes across the country have enrollments of 800 to 1,000 where the only advantage for the student is that his or her anonymity ensures an interrupted 50 minute nap. Or we might consider computerized registration which makes number 100667, more significant than my signature; or library regulations designed to keep books on the shelf, a library check-out service which dispenses more feelings of criminality than it catches stolen books; the profusion of faculty lounges which protect professors from unwittingly revealing their humanity to students over coffee, whatever the regulation, whatever the practice; the size, maintenance and development of the total physical plant in effect says (in the words of the bewildered freshmen):--"Screw the individual student!"

One of our number remembers one summer working at Queen's University where most persons employed by that august institution were flat broke at the end of the spring term. Most students usually are. Not only was the university in no position to anticipate the needs of its own student employees by issuing an advance or at least an early paycheque but a computer payroll system ensured that no one would be paid until summer's end. This person remembers asking the computer (or one of its executive assistants) if he could pick up his paycheque on the last day as he was moving out of town. The answer received was that the computer was programmed to print the cheques, feed them to envelopes and mail them to each employee at his or her summer address. It was a cardinal rule that there would be no interference in this programmed process. He would have to move to Toronto on the same threadbare shoestring that he had worn all summer and wait for the post office to forward his desperately needed funds.

U

There is a second and much more serious level of "inhumanity" in the universities and that is in the way the academic pursuits engaged in emphasize behaviour rather than experience. In the humanities and social sciences the observable behaviour of people is studied to the exclusion of the introspective view of the one who is experiencing the behaviour. But experience is every bit as real as the behaviour that we observe that reflects it.

R. D. Laing, the provocative British psychiatrist has shown us that experience is but one side of reality and behaviour another. There is no inner and outer in human experience save what we give those names. In order to understand persons we need to appreciate the total reality about them. We need to take seriously the experience which gives rise to behaviour. As R.D.Laing says: "Our behaviour is a function of our experience. We act according to the way we see things. If our experience is destroyed our behaviour will be destructive. If our experience is destroyed, we have lost our own selves."

I submit that it is just this over-emphasis on outward action, on behaviour and de-emphasis of experience which fosters the lack of appreciation on the part of the student for his or her own experience. In other words, a university education teaches students to "learn about the world rather than to learn from the world" as Ivan Illich puts it. Lectures, reading lists, term papers and examinations all pressure the student to see social realities as something to be learned about, observed and memorized. There is little to match these activities which would assist students in appreciating their environment, sharing and extending their talents, accepting and critically weighing their own experience, improving their activities by practice and developing their own wisdom and morality. Is it any wonder university teachers complain that students are inexperienced and non-reflective? Students are so because their training circumvents such self-reflection.

To use an example from the field of political studies, we teach students about political institutions and political events but we do not attempt to practise political action or responsible citizenship and critically evaluate our own performance.

There is a further difficulty in this over-emphasis on observable behaviour. Academics call this approach of understanding the world around us scientific realism. It is a realism which critically analyzes and scientifically or systematically re-orders reality. What many of the young, or those who think young, hunger for is a new theory of human intelligence, a new conception of human knowing, and a new definition of reason. The young Catholic theologian, Michael Novak writes that the university faculty (and not the administration) is the real enemy of the student in this struggle for a new understanding. He says that "the faculty is the guardian of the prevailing myth by which reality is to be perceived; the prevailing definition of reason, method, argumentation and even perception. What the faculty says is important exists; what the faculty ignores does not exist. Realism is what one learns in college. "To paraphrase Novak:–where all experience, and especially that of the student, is denigrated social reality is what the professor leads students to read and observe and by the methadology which he advocates.

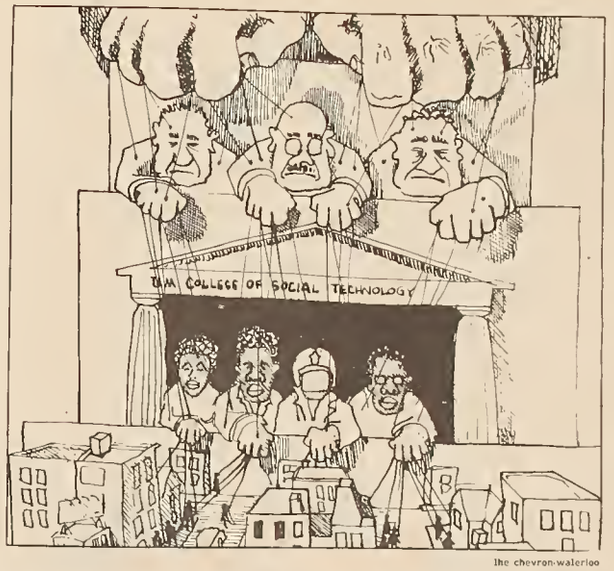
Critics of this realism are joined by young students in calling for a replacement of analytical reason by consciousness which maintains, again as does Michael Novak, that "myth and symbol, feeling and fantasy, experience and imagination, sensitivity and sensibility are given an explicit role in the expression of ethical and political perception and action." As advocates of realism we, the faculty, have for too long been calling such dimensions of human understanding mere romanticism, irrationality or self-indulgence.

Competitive Work Anti-Personal?

Finally, I think the university is viciously anti-personal because of its inordinate emphasis on hard, competitive work. Success, in university circles, is seen as what I achieve 'in relation to other', what I achieve by stepping over and on my fellow students or faculty members. The emphasis on scientific realism makes all endeavours subject to the criticism of fellow students but its extension in the psychological realm is jealousy for another's achievement, secrecy surrounding a new or previously unexpressed idea, and a hulking pride over a higher grade.

The emphasis on learning aboul things and activities rules out an appreciation of the inner risks, development and personal growth and enlargement which might better have constituted our definition of success, and in a much less competitive way. Our emphasis on hard work done in seclusion fails miserably to appreciate how work accomplished in private is profoundly indebted to the prior accomplishments of other and the protective and critical environment or our contemporaries.

Our private scholastic endeavours have as well political significance which we seldom, if ever, recognize. In the first place, what we find when we engage in research (our results) may have profound political implications, depending of course on our degree of willingness to publicize our findings, for example, the discovery of measurement of an inadequate or poorly administered social service. Secondly, the kinds of questions we research will vary in political significance. If we choose a study, let's say "A Comparative Analysis of the Longevity of Government-Issued Pencil Erasers as Utilized by a Random Sampling of Halifax Dartmouth Grade One Pupils", our findings are not likely to have too much political importance. Another question related to, for example, the degree of successful performance of any social or political institution or agency is bound to have more political significance. But our private research is politically relevant not only in what we find and what we question but also in how we investigate (for example, participant observation) may lead to an involvement and identification with persons being studied that a distant analysis based on sample surveys for another example might never risk.



The methodologies we employ may narrow the field of questions that we are able to ask since some could never be tackled by certain methods. Again, the researchers consider how the timing of a study may have political relevance. More students are aware of unforeseen consequences of new discoveries what with our new awareness of the environmental crisis. But all too few researchers consider the political question as to who should get the results of completed studies.

Precious little research is carried on with a view to developing better life for forgotten minorities and issues them with the results. What we require is counter-research which imaginatively and stubbornly attempts to propound and develop stark new alternatives of outworn ways of doing things.

Ivan Illich calls for such research, a "research on alternatives to the products which now dominate the market; to hospitals and the profession dedicated to keeping the sick alive (the research required for a heart transplant while thousands die of amoebic dysentry) to schools and the packaging process which refuses education to those who are not of the right age, who have not gone through the curriculum, who have not sat in a classroom a sufficient number of successive hours, who will not look for their learning with submission to custodial care, screening and certification or with indoctrination in the values of the dominant elite."

Provocative statements like Illich's above may remind academics that our quiet studies in carpeted offices do not cease to be political just because we avoid taking sides. Our decision not to engage upon a study which would be given over to the poor for use against the existing economic and political order, far from being politically neutral is in fact politically reactionary. We fail to recognize that even our feeble attempts at neutrality are rooted in the assumption that the political and educational climate and institutions within which we work are also neutral and harmless if not powerless. American academic research only reflect on the fact that 65 percent of all university research is directly or indirectly sponsored by government agencies to show the error of such an assumption.

Perhaps the greatest error we make as academics is to allow the 'politically neutral' empiricist that our 'politically particular position removes us from a position or commitment.

What our stance does in fact is to make us full-fledged participants in the existing way of doing and seeing things. What reforms we may propound will all, in the final analysis, serve the existing social order. What is stifled within us, says Novak, is the "revolutionary, utopian, visionary impulse." We come to accept instead compromise, patience and acquiescence. We grow incapable of attacking problems in such a way as to build a significantly better system because we fail to strike with imagination and concern at the very roots of the traditional pattern and order.

Our research produces reforms which are tacked on to the present social system. Yet "there is compelling evidence," says Novak, "that realistic social and political reforms do not, in fact, alter power arrangements or weaken key interest groups in our society; political symbols change, but the same elites remain in unchallenged power. "What we are actually doing is concretizing or gypostatizing certain social, political, economic or educational alternatives and making them harden into reality or into the only possibilities, while fragile faintly visible possibilities become increasingly buried by the so-called tried and true.

Moral Bankruptcy

The overall style of our teaching and research with its unquestioned realism and emphasis on behaviour conducted as it is with such political naivete is the source of the third evil to be found on Canadian campuses, i.e. moral bankruptcy.

Where students learn about social reality without an equal emphasis on learning from the reality, professors have the power to define reality by the reading lists they distribute, by the assigned topics of their term papers, by the approved methodologies they lecture upon, and by the content of their final examinations. The discrediting of student experience is damaging to the student personally and like a cancerous growth it sinks into the inner consciousness of students to the point where students find it ever more difficult to recognize what they themselves think and feel. But as well, this deprecation of experience eats away the basis from which students feel concern and responsibility for others. The realism of university education tends to destroy the basis upon which wisdom and morality must be founded:–that is, personal experience and intelligent reflection upon it.

Michael Polanyi, that great philosopher of science, talks about the tacit Dimension to human knowing:–"we know more than we can tell." We can 'recognize' a friend's face yet be unable to describe the separate features of that face. We recognize the parts of a frog, a machine or whatever because of our prior knowledge of the whole to which they belong.

The experience of the student is analagous to Polanyi's tacit dimension of knowing. The student learns better the wider his or her own reflection on it. If the student's own experience is down-graded, or even worse disoriented and distorted, by repeated and highly sophisticated assaults on it by faculty and students' arguments and examples the well from which the student's behaviour is drawn becomes an empty shaft encrusted with self-distrust. Students come to overlook and distrust what is in themselves. They have less within upon which to shape patterns without. Inward emptiness and moral bankruptcy is a direct result of the style of university education in the past and its continued refusal to consider seriously the emptiness it has caused in the present.

In short, university education is built on specific stories or myths about what the real world is like and how we can come to know it. Our practices and methodologies have made numbers out of persons by measuring success by grades, size, volume and control; robbed students of their self-respect by discounting their personal experience; made competing cranks out of faculty by rewarding their fiercest competitive tendencies; blinded us from our political responsibilities for changing the social order and serving the defenceless segments of the human community by encouraging secluded research for governments and business; made a virtue of passivity and caution and indecision even in times of the most dire social need; bureaucratized the wisdom of the ages; and convinced a generation of scholars that their ideals must be tailored to fit reality:–that a lack of moral commitment would somehow now only enhance scholarship but change the world for the better. For these and other reasons we can fairly add moral bankruptcy to the description of the present evils integral to university education.

Can We Justify our Continued Association With Universities?

What we ought seriously to be questioning is how as faculty and students we can in all conscious continue to associate ourselves with a university

We justify our staying on in a teaching position only as we struggle to re-examine the myths which undergird the university and our own understanding of them. It seems to us that the uncloaking of myths is the central task of all students be they social or natural scientists, philosophers or theologians, and that the uncloaking must necessarily begin with ourselves, our own training and the institutions with which we are associated.

Secondly, we believe that as faculty we can justify an extended contract with the university if our teaching practices enable students to learn from the world rather than simply about it. Hence, we teach political institutions and we practise citizenship, we open up the universities to those who want to learn; the desire to learn is their eligibility to enroll, not prerequisite courses, ability to pay or certification. We justify our attachment to the university as we detach ourselves and take our books, ideas and knowledge to be used by the larger community outside.

We should justify our research only as it becomes counter-research, that research which recognizes its political obligations and struggles to construct radical alternatives for a new society; that research which can be employed by those who most need it and seldom have access to it; the poor, the dispossessed, the politically defenceless minorities.

Thirdly, we justify our continued association with the university by struggling to build a new moral view of ourselves and our education. The brilliant psychoanalyst and social critic Ernest Becker has written a most careful treatise called Beyond Alientation in which he ever so thoroughly traces the gradual return of morality to the post-scientific world-view and the content of education. We hope that in what we've already said about the university's moral failures you may agree with us that we need to continue our scientific and philosophic analyses and comparisons of moral positions and ethical problems. But in addition we, all of us, faculty and students alike, need to express our questions of conscience, we need to encourage intelligent commitments and consciously engage one another with our senses of social obligation and personal convictions.

It would be comforting to think that the development and living out of such convictions may yet lead to some more humane, politically aware and morally sensitive community of scholars in the future.

Artist had no pollution right

Dear Editors:
This letter is written in response to previous letters in the Journal concerning vandalism of the "Pollution" sculpture. The tune of previous letters was "no one has the right to alter an artist's work except the artist!". The tune of this letter is "does an artist have the right (I don't mean legal) to display his works where they cannot be avoided by the public if a considerable portion of the public considers them offensive?"

An extreme example might clarify my point. If an artist's idea of beautiful art work is a dead baby on a pitchfork sprayed with plastic, does the artist have the right to put this sculpture in a place where many people cannot avoid seeing it? I think not.

I am not interested whether or not Pollution is art. Art is a matter of opinion. Vandalism of art or non art is wrong, unless adequate reason backs the vandalism. Reducing the offensiveness of this work, which the public could not avoid, was reason enough.

One might say "Statues in parks are unavoidable to the public; should these not be allowed either?" Statues in parks are not offensive to most.

One might say "The purpose of the art was to be offensive; to make us more aware of pollution." So what. Is anyone with a purpose entitled to impose it on the public? If my purpose is to lower the population of the world, am I entitled to kill people?

One might say "The artist is not responsible because the city council asked him to put his sculpture where he did." Why not then give responsibility to our whole legal system which gave the city council its powers. One could regress infinitely here giving the responsibility to the ultimate cause in the universe (God or whatever). I say the artist is responsible, nobody else.

Answer this question. Does an artist have the right to display his works of art to the public if they are unavoidable and offensive? If your answer is "No" then don't get uptight when someone reduces their offensiveness or destroys them.

TGIF is no blessing

Dear Editors:
I'm sure that Jennifer Harker had good times and found intellectual abundance at TGIF. For her cheerful optimism I express my appreciation. I might mention that opinions expressed privately to me since the printing of our letter have been in our favour.

My own feelings about TGIF were formed long before I became a member of GSS, when I first moved to the neighbourhood of King and Lower Union. My sentiments became similar to those of nearby residents. They were not congenial, and have not changed much, since I've been able to take my outside opinion inside.

Drinking places vary in style. The style depends on the preferences of the clientele. So it is that the Holiday Inn has its own style, as do the Grand Hotel and Grad House.

The preferences of drinkers depend on how much they like to spend. Regulars of the Grand drink there rather than at the Inn for one reason. Cheap beer. Regulars at Grad House drink there rather than at either for the same reason. Cheap beer.

It has been suggested that past problems of Grad House can be attributed to previous managers. I suggest that house managers do not breed vulgar inebriates. Drunks make themselves, more often than not under the mistaken assumption that they are approaching beatification. The observable achievement is somewhat less than this pleasant and graceful ideal.

Now let's bear down on the real issue here. Grad House is a good thing. Grad students need one for a number of good reasons. As a place for a welcome mat, as a meetingplace, as a home away from home, and so on. Grad students deserve a house. The granting of one by the Administration should be done in good faith, and the arrangement should be a matter of fair play.

But TGIF should not be the issue. It is a stereotype with campus roots in the undergraduate habit of indiscreet nausea. There is no reason for outsiders like Administrators to expect that Grads behave differently. They have an impression drawn from their own past; some may still see it in their present. Imagine an Administrator with a conception of TGIF similar to my own. It's not hard.

Supporting TGIF as the reason for a Grad House is a mockery of what Grad House is about. The GSS discredits itself and makes its members look less than reasonable. Administrators chuckle and get on to other things.

There are serious problems in Grad School. The GSS works quietly at solving some of these. If theses are in fact being plagiarized; if some students do get a hard time from staff for reasons that are none of their business; if there are inequities in the distribution of student support money, then the GSS has a place. But its success depends on its credibility and its responsibility.

It has also been suggested to me that a weekly TGIF helps the GSS maintain a "high profile" on campus. I suggest TGIF is the worst kind of profile. TGIF makes the GSS look bad and hinders its efforts where it is needed.

Meanwhile, Jennifer, I bear no grudges concerning your use of the adjectival. Biologists are alright. I remember the old days when they used to drop acid and peer into microscopes. Great Stuff. If you'd like to name a pub I'll catch the first round.

Learning, not cruelty

Dear Editors,
I am a student in Psychology 205 (Learning Psychology) and I take exception to Jim Good's extremely myoptic view of the course as well as his many objections.

Psych 205 is not a study of rat behavior, but rather a study of the theories behind learning. In order to achieve the objectivity necessary in the field of endeavour, and in order not to be seduced by our preconceived notions of humans, it seems to me to be emminently reasonable to use non-human subjects and titrate out what is less than human.

As for the mistreatment alluded to, the rats - in our lab at least - are not starved, merely made hungry; nor are they electrocuted - the shock can hardly be called anything else than mildly uncomfortable. Indeed the S.P.C.A. had a rather extensive list of things which cannot be done to rats. (Human subjects have no such protection.)

Of course, watching "Herman" the rat will not help in "loving" or "knowing" other people but that is not the purpose of the course. If you want empathy or understanding, enroll in a sensitivity course or drown yourself in coffee and conversation. Psych 205 is for those interested in learning!

V-Ball Gaels begin

T. Becke
On Saturday Nov. 15 the men's volleyball team played in their first tournament of this season at the Anderson Gym. The team managed to win only one of their three matches.

They lost their first match to University of Toronto 3-0, and then went on to be defeated by Laurentian 3-0. During these first two matches the team played inconsistently and never could maintain a penetrating attack for any length of time. In the last game against Ryerson the team finally managed to put it all together and they beat Ryerson 3-0.

The team this year has only one player who has returned from last year. The rest of the team consists entirely of rookies, three 2nd year students, and five first year students). These young players show good potential and a willingness to learn. This team will play better once it has some game experience under its belt. The team will be playing next in Ottoawa on Nov. 29 in an invitational tournament.

Wic-ly News

Withe the term drawing to an end and exams coming closer, Wic activities are reaching completion. Basketball finals are next Tuesday at 7:15; Ice Hockey finals are next Wednesday at 7:00; Co-ed Volleyball finals are next Thursday at 7:15; Paddleball tournament continues, and we should have a winner pretty soon. This is your last chance to come out and support your team - don't let your team lose by default!

Bews News

Paul Findlay
Bews Indoor Softball Innertube Waterpolo and Volleyball regular seasons are all completed and playoffs have started.

In Softball in the competitive Division 1, Bus. Grads earned 1st place with a 6-2 record, Commerce '77 were 2nd at 5-3. In Division 2 P.H.E. topped the standings at 8-1, Mechanical were second at 4-3 (missing two games due to a mix up in entries). Division 3 with only 3 teams left had Arts '77 with the leagues only perfect record at 8 and 0, Commerce '76 were 6-2. Division 4 saw defending champs Arts '76 tie for 1st with Commerce '79. The former were 6 and 3, the latter had 6 wins 2 losses, which included a default, and 1 tie. Arts '76 was awarded 1st place.

The quarter-finals were played on Wednesday, and the semi-finals last night. The quarter-final games were Bus. Grads v Comm '76, Arts '77 v Comm '77, P.H.E. v Comm '79, Arts '76 v Mechanical. Note that 7 of the 8 teams are in the top 9 places in the Bews standings. The 2-out-of-3 finals will be played next Monday, Tuesday and if necessary Wednesday at 9:15 in the Bews Gym.

In Volleyball, in Division 1, P.H.E. were 8-1 and Education 6-2 to take the top 2 spots. In Division 2, Arts '77 again were the only team with a perfect record with 8 wins, Comm '78 was 6 and 4. In Division 3 defending champs Mining were 8-1, Chemical were 6-2. Last year's runners-up Bus. Grads headed Division 4 at 7 and 4, Civil-Math were 2nd at 6-3.

Quarter-finals were last night with P.H.E. v Comm '78, Mining v Civil-Math, Arts '77 v Education, and Bus. Grads v Chemical. Semi-final and final games will be played next Thursday at 9:00 and 10:00 respectively.

In Innertube Waterpolo, Division A was won by Arts '77 at 4-0 (again a perfect record) with Mechanical 2nd at 3-1. Division B was won by Law '78 at 4-0. Arts '78 and Arts '76 were both 2-1-1 so in a playoff game Arts '78 won a quarter-final position by virtue of a 7-2 decision. In Division C Bus. Grads at 3-0-1 and Comm '77 at 3-1 made the quarter-finals. In Division D Comm '76 were 3-0-1 and Education were 3-1-6 to advance. In quarter-final action Comm '77 took Law '78, 8-2. Arts '77 beat Bus. Grads 9-2. Education drowned Mechanical, 9-3. Comm '76 and Arts '78 tangled on Wednesday night. Semi-finals were played yesterday afternoon. The finals were played last night.

This weekend the Interfaculty Indoor Softball Tournament will be held. This competition is distinguished from Bews in that it is among faculties and not individual years, disciplines, etc. The 1st game is at 7:00 p.m. tonight between Arts and P.H.E. Grads play Engineering at 8:00 and Commerce takes on Law at 9:00. The loser of the 1st game will play the winner of the 2nd game at 4:30 on Saturday. At 5:30 the winner of the 1st game will play the winner of the 2nd game at 4:30 on Saturday. At 5:30 the winner of the 1st game will play the loser of the 2nd game. Then the winners of those games will play the winner of the 3rd game and the loser of the 3rd game respectively at 6:30 and 7:30. The winners of those games will play the final at 9:00. Follow? If not don't worry. All games will be played in the Bews Gym and spectators are welcome.

In tournament sports the team of Campling and Neville of Commerce '79 beat the duo of Wallace and Boyd of Arts '76, 6-4, 6-2, 6-3 to win the Bews doubles tennis championship. Singles tennis is at the quarter-final stage and it is hoped it will be finished before the snow flies.

B-Ball Gaels lose

Alps Boniwell
People learn from their mistakes, it is hoped. If the Basketball Gaels are studious enough to take full advantage of the blunders they made in dropping a 78-60 contest to the York Yeomen last Saturday, it would be no surprise to see them all emerge with dectorates of basketball. Even assuming an absorption of less than 100 percent it would be impossible on sheer volume alone not to come out of it much the wiser.

Any curriculum in a study of last Saturday nights game would undoubtedly include a course in breaking York's match-up zone defenee. Particular emphasis would be plaeed on working the ball inside, either by pass to the pivot men or penetrating with the dribble so that the zone doesn't resemble some sort of invisible force field that only allows the opposition to pass hurriedly around it's perimeter.

Although due credit must be given to York's tough defenee, it was the Gaels who added to it that seeming air of impenetrability but not working inside and insisting on launching Howitzers from long-range. This philosophy, while abortive, at least would have proven more effective had Queen's taken their hands out of eold storage prior to the opening tip. Derek Swinnard led the Gaels seoring with 15 points but only Dale Sanderson could find the bucket with consistent accuracy hitting on 5 of 7 from the floor and finishing with 11 points. The rest of the team displayed decrepit shooting forcing bad shots and missing easy ones.

The Yeomen offense is beautifully simplistie, fast-break and shoot and although the Gaels defence for the most part was good York continually frustrated Queen's with their dead-eye sniper fire from everywhere on the court. Rinneo Callegan who notched 31 points was especially damaging and along with the rest of the York team, they wore out the netting on the basket for three quarters until Queen's started to turn the tempo the other way. Applying a full-court zone press Queen's opened the game up, finally beginning to fun and fast-breaking themselves. Consequently the Gaels rarely gave York a chance to set up their defence and by virtue of that their shooting improved proportionately. The press itself functioned effectively not only to produce a few steals but to pressure York into the kind of lame duck shots that Queen's was so eager to take in the first half. This then has to be the primary lesson learned on Saturday. Queen's game is a running game and probably from now on a stronger pressing game. There's no doubt that they have the strength and ability to play that style very well. Indeed the fast-break won't be hampered by a lack of rebounds. Against York Dave Lockhart pulled down 20 while Andy Boniwell chipped in 12. An impressive total to be sure but equally sad considering Queen's didn't take proper advantage of all those boards. That has to change and it will. If there's one thing you learn at Queen's it's how to study. Tonight at 8:15 the Gaels get a chance to atone for their sins of last week, when they host the Laurentian Voyageurs, if they learned their lesssons well. Come out and watch the verdict for yourself.

Grounds' Impressive Collection

Last week...

Cynthia David

Laurie Flood, a 20-year old music student from Potsdam N.Y. hitchhiked to Kingston to play at Bitter Grounds on Saturday night. A wide, friendly smile greeted the crowd, and her clear voice filled the hall. She was made welcome.

Laurie plays contemporary folk, ranging from the sad, quiet ballads and love songs of Bruce Cockburn and Simon and Garfunkel to the bluesy melodies of Bonnie Raite, "Love me like a man," and Buffalo Springfield. But she features the music of Joni Mitchel in such classics as Big Yellow Taxi and Chelsea Morning. Mitchel's inspiration was obvious in her voice, which soared high and smooth and dropped easily into a lower range. Every word hung in the air over the hushed audience.

Her songs were usually brief and the dialogue casual, displaying a warm, open personality which is reflected in her original material. Of her first sight of the ocean she sang, "I remember laughing and not having to question why". The singer's guitar playing and piano solo both complemented her fine voice, and indicated that Ms. Flood is indeed a very talented and versatile musician.

The friendly mood of the evening extended into the first guest set which featured newcomer Anthony Kaduck on guitar. John Prince tunes, particularly Salvation for the Living, and Arlo Guthrie's Ring Around the Rosy Rag (touch your nose and blow your toes!) were thoroughly enjoyed by all, and contrasted with the more serious and gentle songs like Hobo's Lullaby to complete a great performance.

The audience supplied the harmony for the evening, singing along with familiar tunes, (once in a three-part round), learning choruses and even an original song by Michael Hassock, although the entire song consisted of only one verse.

Hassockthe second guest artist of the evening is no stranger to Bitter Grounds. In a low, rough voice he sings about dancehall girls and can I play with your poodle?? Although I do not know if he is built for comfort, as he says, I do know that his harmonica and guitar are built for some interesting music.

Brent Titcomb (The Great Vizaudo) evolved through the Vancouver coffee house scene in the early sixties. He performed as a comic cum folksinger for a couple of years. He then met Donna Warner and Trevor Veitch and together they formed the group "3's A Crowd". For the first year the group worked in the western provinces and finally they moved East to Toronto where they got a recording contract with Epic Records. Out of this the single "Bound To Fly" was a moderate hit. The group did a lot of radio and television work and while playing at Expo 67 they were discovered by Mamma Cass and eventually recorded with Dunhill Records in Los Angeles The group emerged as a top folk-rock group in Canada for two years in a row. Another moderate hit was "Bird Without Wings".

In 1968 Brent left the group and started writing songs. His most successful song as a songwriter was "Sing High, Sing Low" recorded by Anne Murray. His involvement with Anne included performing on her specials, touring with and working on her albums. As a single artist he has done radio and television work, jingles (animated voices), and sessions in the studio.

In 1974 he started hanging out with Tommy Graham and hasn't been the same since. They have been doing gigs together and are currently in the process of recording Brent's first LP, (Tommy producing). Brent's background of working in intimate audience environments and TG's rock roots together make for an interesting combination.

Tommy Graham (alias Rooz Roots) evolved through the electric band scene in Toronto during the 1960's. In the early 60's he played in a house band at Toronto's first rhythm and blues club "The Bluenote". It was there that he learned what it was all about musically as the band had to make up instant arrangements for the singers and musicians who happened to show up. Some of these people included Jimmy Reed, John Lee Hooker, Maxine Brown, and the Vibrations.

Around 1963 he formed his own band originally intended to back up singer Shirley Matthews but later they went independent and called themselves "The Big Town Boys". The band flourished for about four years and in the process Tommy was exposed to network television and the early recording scene in Toronto (three track). The band attained some degree of national prominence, however, in 1967 he decided to take a break. He travelled for two years, sixteen months of which was spent living, travelling and learning music in India. This was really different so he absorbed as much music and culture as he could at that time.

The show starts at 9pm but the doors open at 8pm with tickets and memberships on sale at the door. Tickets $2.25 with a members card. That's this Saturday, November 22 at Clark Hall (above the Campus Book Store).

Concert tonight

Queen's Wind Ensemble at Grant Hall last Tuesday booth

Queen's Chamber Orchestra, under the direction of Clifford Crawley, will give their first concert for this season in Grant Hall, on Saturday, 22 November, at 8:30 p.m. The concert, presented by the Music Department, is admission free. The orchestra comprises thrity-five instrumentalists: fifteen strings, woodwind, brass, and percussion. Concert mistress is Allana Deptuch.

The programme opens with two familiar classical works: Mozart's Overture to Don Giovanni; and Schubert's Fifth Symphony. After the intermission, they will present three short fugues, which include two arrangements of Bach: one highly original and rarely performed, from The Musical Offering by Anton Webern; and one more conventional arrangement of the Fugue a la Gigue, by Gustave Holst. The third fugue is from the 4th symphony of Charles Ives based on "From Greenland's Icy Mountains" and other well-known hymn tunes. This particular version of the work includes a part will conclude with "Party Piece" by the young English composer Richard Rodney Bennett. This latter is a lively work which incorporates jazz idioms for solo piano and orchestra. The solo pianist is Catherine Roy.

This is the first concert by the Chamber Orchestra under the direction of Clifford Crawley who is also known to Kingston audiences in his capacity of conductor of the Kingston Symphony Youth Orchestra.

Touchstone gets grant

Wednesday evening the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society (ASUS) granted the new arts publication Touchstone $350 towards the costs of the first edition of the magazine.

In its brief to the council Touchstone staff emphasized that as a new magazine they will be offering their contributors an accessability and closeness necessary to the development of the writer or artist. Often these qualities are missing from the larger, established magazines.

Touchstone's editor, Dave Colburn, also made mention of the educative qualities of the publication. A very important part of the magazine will be the initiating of public readings and workshops which would allow an exchange of ideas and artistic concerns. "Touchstone's intention is to give creative persons and their works a vehicle for publication, discussion and improvement," was one of Cloburn's comments to the ASUS council.

When interviewed by the Journal Touchstone's editor stated: "This grant from ASUS will go a long way towards the realization of our dream, I hope other campus bodies will be as generous.

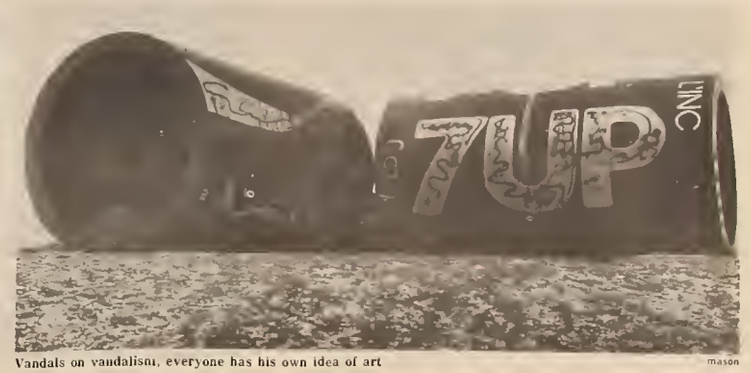
Make love to me

To Sarah Bernhardt, turn-of-the-century farceur Georges Feydeau was "the greatest writer of farces every to live." This extravagent-sounding claim stands the test of time. Only Moliere 200 years before, and the Marx Brothers 30 years later ridiculed the sexual mores of the ruling classes with as much verve, precision, and uproarious insanity.

Our Husband-to-Be and Through the Window, the two short plays which comprise Make Love to Me were written early in Feydeau's career and are somewhat unique because he wrote relatively few one act plays. Yet they contain the same accurate caricature, mad situations, and witty dialogue as his late comic masterpiece, A Flea In Her Ear.

Feydeau always begins with a logical premise which, under the pressure of bourgeois pomposity. Such is the case in Make Love to Me. The mad situation in Our Husband-to-Be revolves around two sisters who discover that they love the same man. Through the Window revolves around a fatuous barrister whose lunch is interrupted by a zany young woman seeking an incredible type of revenge on a jealous husband.

In an attempt to capture the tone of high farce, the scripts for Make Love to Me were specially adapted for this production by Professor Patricia Seberman of the French Department. The shows are directed by Professor Bernard Burkom of the Department of Drama, whose productions last season included Comedy Tonight, Medea, and the Thurber Readings. These two short plays are designed by the final year student Anthony Abrams, whose Government Inspector set recently delighted audiences. Our Husband-to-Be features Barbara Edwards and Virginia Grieg. Through the Window features Robert Hanks and Shelley Cavalier.



Make Love to Me runs Tuesday 25 November through Saturday 29 November in the Studio, Room 102, Theological Hall. Curtain time is 7:00p.m. Tickets are available at the Drama Desk, 547-6291, or at the door A silver collection will be taken.

Is this an audience I see before me?

The quality of mercy is not strained... bronskill

Alain Casavant

To write a review of McArthur's produetion of Macbeth based on opening night is a diffieult task. Rather than making any commentary on the interpretation of the play, or on the aetors' abilities, I would prefer to eongratulate the entire cast for making it through a very harrowing experience without just giving up and merely running through the motions or even refusing to come out on stage.

It was a performanee that suffered under the worst eurse possible: an inattentive high-school audienee.

If you have ever attended a high-school matinee performanee, or even better, acted in one, I need not say more, but I am driven to do so for the sake of two women in the audience, the two women who sat behind me during the show, two Bayridge Secondary School teachers. Little did they guess that in front of them, listening to their rationalizations of the situation, sat a very attentive eavesdropper curious to find out about the present educational system.

Under their eharge was one eighth of the audience, yet also about one third of the rowdiest, ineonsiderate, and ignorant students I've yet to see or hear. When they realized that their "field trip" was turning into a horror show, eomplete with all kinds of monsters imaginable, the following eomments came out: (I try to quote as exactly as possible) "don't get exeited about it. All it will do is ruin the performance for you". If they don't want to listen, why should we make them?" "It's good for the aetors. They have to concentrate more, and it makes a better show." "And after all, in Shakespeare's time this was nothing." Even when the paper airplanes started flying they did not flinch.

I use the example of the Bayridge students since I was somewhat closer acquainted with them, but the other schools were no better behaved nor were their supervisor more sensitive to the rest of the audienee. Although not all of the high school students misbehaved, nothing suited the high-school classes in the aduience more than their leaving of it.

The only good to eome out of the entire fiaseo, for into every rain a little life must fall, was that since this happened at the teachers's college it showed the student teachers exaetly what the present educational system is eapable of, and is, producing. They, as future edueators, must question what went wrong and why, and then find a better way.

David Kemp, who plays the title role, said that the play was designed "to make Shakespeare eome alive" but that a eertain aspect of the production had failed in that McArthur had had to "ring up the schools coming" to the performances "and tell them what was happening".

But as for the production itself, director Andrew Orr had decided to do a traditional production, which is refreshing in this day of Shakespeare a la Western, or whatever, but it also included several gimmicky and eorny effeets ineluding sword thrust between the arm and body, a sword fight up a stairease, and a bleeding papier maehe head on a sword. In all there was a lack of direction; it seemed at times to be little more than a costumed play reading.

Gavin Semple's set was impressive at first glance, with its many levels and stark colours and shape, yet it never added at any time to the mood of the play, and in several seenes, partieularly the outdoor ones, it was quite distraeting; as during the first witehes' scenes in the moor when one kep wondering what that castle was doing there.

Lady Maebeth, played by Lorne Wilson, was a powerful woman quite capable of controlling Kemp's Maebeth. Both these players had good control over the poetry of the lines but there were times when the meaning of the lines came seeond to the rhythm and it beeame difficult to understand what was going on.

The highlight of the show however was Howard Hughes as Macduff. An experieneed actor, Hughes handled both the role and the audience well. The few quiet moments were the thirty seeonds following the entrance of any one of these three characters.

The show is worth seeing, but if you do go, go on Saturday-there's less chance of any high-sehool classes being there. Curtain time is 8:30 p.m. and the show is at the McArthur auditorium.

Sex and the single theolog

Dear Editors

In response to "Copeland". As my colleague has opened the proverbial can of sex and the single theolog, here are a few more worms which crawl around in it.

First of all, I can heartily endorse his call for putting love and understanding back into sexual relationships and for respecting anyone's "moral" decision regarding premarital sex. Such decisions are never easy to make and I doubt they are exclusive to the single theolog.

Brian Copeland states: "There is to my knowledge, no theological basis...for premarital sex." Certainly the Bible is clear in its strictures on extra-marital sex and homosexuality. Yet in regard to premarital sex, the only restriction would seem to be that if one has premarital sex, one must marry the partner with whom one engages in such activity.

According to Luke (1:27 and 2:5), Jesus, whether one holds his brith to be miraculous or natural, was conceived out of wedlock.

Lest I be accused of prooftexting and of being a Biblical literalist (which I certainly am not) let me point out simply that it is extremely important to see the words of the Bible in context. Overall, it seems that the writers are addressing themselves to the sexual mores of their day and age.

Brian seems to take a Pauline position of double-standard. What may be okay for people in general, is not okay for theologs. The societal mind-set seems to be that clergy are set apart from the masses and are expected to live up to a calling of holier-than-thou. Yet firstly, clergy are human beings too, all are sinners potentially. To bow to societal pressure is somewhat of a cop-out and a non-assertion of one's own personal integrity. A personal decision for no premarital sex is respectable, and I'm sure that's Brian's decision. That has problems inherent however, for it sets up the single theolog, male or female, for 'safe' dates with the opposite sex. Not all single theologs take that position. Some of us can't easily deny our humanity. We drink, smoke, swear and have sex, and are fully prepared to assert our rights to our private lives. We are also willing to bear the consequences and responsibilities of such a decision. We are also in contstant sturggle with sin and guilt, like most people. We have the same phobiae as the laity about getting caught in the act and then having to justify our behaviour.

Yet we enjoy life. We're willing to be at one with the world in which we live, not just to assert our humanity but also to affirm that moral decisions are always personal and that some so-called "immoral activities" are in reality no different than a decision to take up a career. Any decision requires that one accept responsibility for that decision. Whole church position papers on morality are important, there is also a need for ministers to get off their fat pulpits and confront problems such as alcoholism, sexual deviance, and so on head-on. We hold that we can still be exemplary and modular Christians in the manner in which we conduct our lives.

Homophiles: two views

Dear Editors

This letter is the result of thought stemming from a very real, and emotional reaction to many of the things Jayne Coulter seemed to represent in her letter of Nov 11 in the Journal. If this letter seems very theoretical, it is because I intended it so.

While reading her letter, I noticed a strong, flowing literary style which seemed to express clearly her motives for writing it. These motives appeared to be deep-rooted, sincere, and real feelings. Such sensitivity openly expressed impressed me -- no, not "impressed"; her sensitivity touched me. The word "impressed" is an example of a word that connotes something which Jayne Coulter seemed to be fighting; i.e. worrying about other people's impressions.

It seems that one is constantly on view to others who may judge and criticize, and if someone is different, he is liable to be more harshly judged and criticized, i.e. one can't digress "too far" from the generally accepted interpretation of a poem, for example-Well, one can, but one won't achieve as much recognition (marks).

What seems sad is the reason which underlies a person's different stance; he was probably receptive and open to new alternatives.

Openness is good, it is right, and it is enriching; taken to extreme, it would appear to be near perfect. However, within practicality, one values the concept of being "reasonably open", i.e. a degree of openness toward new and changing ideas, bounded by the natural defence mechanism that raises itself to avoid questioning all that is accepted.

About the jokes concerning various sorts of "queer" people, i.e. homophiles, homosexuals, members of different ethnic groups: that laughter seems cyclical in that it moves from the object of human back to the subject, because it makes fun of something the subject doesn't understand.

Perhaps the 25 cent fee allocated to the Queen's Homophile Association should be placed on a sliding scale and be optionally paid along with one's tuition fees. In this way, the decision would be open to the individual. Practical implications must also be considered in such a practical (financial) situation; it seems that the QHA's theory and purpose, along with a clear explanation of the suggested method of payment would have to be widely and clearly advertised.

In conclusion, I propose that one might be much better able to appreciate and understand the differences which surround him, if he can perceive the nature and stimulus for such variations. One's moral, religious and social socialization limits one's awareness of many things. For example, the young child is taught that the existence of people such as homophiles is a moral, religious and social wrong. Yet if the adult openly views, for example, the social aspect, he can see two persons who should be more easily able to openly communicate with each other since they were socialized into the same role. Perhaps also, homosexual actions do not substantiate their present, negative connotations, but rather have the positive connotations of being a natural extension of an affection too deep and real to be restrained.

Something or someone who is different deserves recognition for the implications of openness which the mere fact of their difference supports. This recognition deserves to be furthered into becoming appreciation if such a person proves himself. Jayne Coulter seemed to prove herself by living intensely (not dramatically) according to what she is. She was unaware of any "difference" until criticism made her aware. It seems sad that she had to leave in order to prove herself to others, but perhaps it is not sad, because she seems to do so by that action.

One can't prove openness as valid and real by critical testing; one can only prove it through enriching, deep, sincere and real experience.

Dear Editors

The seeds of dissent have again been sown in our midst. The need for the formation of a new group on Campus is evident; hence, the QACOPE - the Queen's Apple Core and Orange Peel Eaters. We have formed this group because we believe that we have been looked upon as being abnormal for too long. So this group is for those of you who empathize with us...for those who understand that the succelence of the apple is more than meat deep. It's for you who delight in the tang of the pulp of the orange. It's for all of us who know that we have a right to all the nutritive value of these foods. In short, it's for all you true fruit lovers.

We hope to operate a referral service onCampus. It's aims will be: 1. to provide the general public with information about the total nutritive value of fruit; 2. to educate them as to what their rights are in this regard; 3. to provide a referral service to our members so they know where to get the best fruit in the area; and 4. to provide an emergency telephone service for our members, so that if they wake up with an insatiable craving, they'll know where to get fruit late at night.

For all those interested, we are planning a meeting (during the day!) in an apple orchard north of the city. Watch for further details.

And for all of you who do not understand, and still think us different, all we can say is we hope you are enlightened enough to attempt to understand. Don't be too quick to judge and condemn. Besides, if you try it, you may find that you like it.

Computer not thinking

Dear Editors

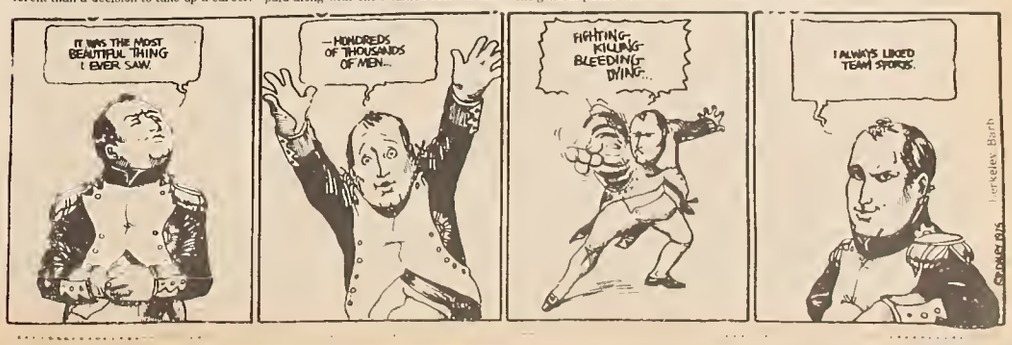
Hi Hal.

We were wondering where they put you after your computer performance in '2001'.

Now you've turned up at Queen's working for the "Office of the Accountant" at Richardson Hall.

I received your computer print out this week in the handy, windowless, 'let's-all save-the-post-office-money' envelope. It was very considerate of you Hal. Thank you.

Perhaps soon you can take over the office yourself and put those people out of work. After all, if they have all that time to feed information into you just to remind me that I will owe them money two months from now, I guess they don't have very much to do.



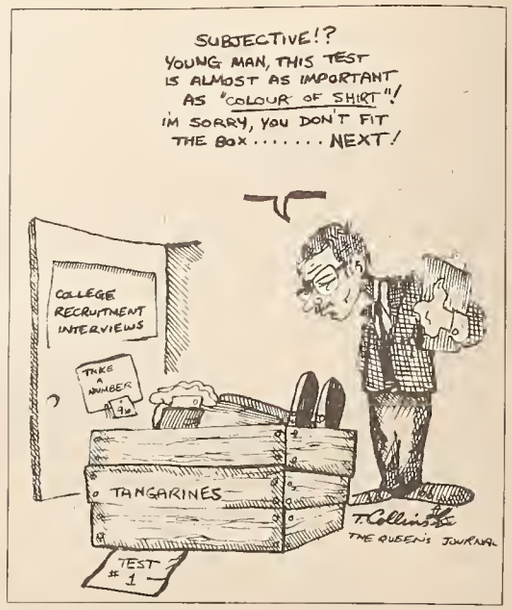
Maybe those people haven't heard of the concept of 'appropriate tehcnology' Hal. You remember? That's when people make use of what they have for beneficial and sensible goals.

Anyway, Hal, it was nice to open the envelope and read those two-tone blue and white forms with all those neat code numbers on them. Someone must have spent a lot of money devising all those mysterious codes opposite the money amounts -- not to mention the cost of your time as well as someone else's to program you.

It's not very efficient or very beneficial, is it Hal?

Perhaps sometime soon the powers-to-be withering away in the bureaucracy will decide that you and your friends are quickly becoming obsolete. And then maybe they'll send you away for a long deserved rest, just as they did in 2001.

Your friend,
Bob Gauthier



Can you see past your nose?

"The noblest study of man is man" said Sam Johnson. This seems to be only a racewide statement of the situation here today: "The noblest study of me is me." Me and my interests are all that matters. The artsci can discuss "the roots of 19th century psuedo-romanticism in 14th century High German Literature of the stages". The Scientist can discuss "the Period-Luminosity relationship of the Cephiad Variables as discovered by Dr. Cecelia Payne Gaposhkin". Neither one recognises any value in the other's field of study. Everyone is a specialist. It is the intellectual equivalent of putting the right front hubcap in place on every Chevrolet made, so that the next person in line can hammer it in tight. Nobody cares about the finished product. No overall view of the final product is obtained.

Surely the object of learning is to increase our understanding of man and the universe. Of what value is it then to stare in only one direction, to know everything about one thing, and nothing about anything else. We are becoming intellectual castrati.

Each person thinks that his own field of study is the only one, and that everything should be looked at from his perspective. The politics major injects politics into everything, the economics major sees economics everywhere, the chemist chemistry.

We stopped putting blinkers on horses a long time ago. Why do we still wear them ourselves? We need a return to the Renaissance man: someone willing to study many subjects; someone who will be able to see more intellectually than his own nose. It's not likely to happen, but wouldn't it be nice?

Synopsis: New York is going to be bombed by the Russians unless it returns Rockefeller. Angus McTavish, a 3.5 foot Martian with three arms and bad breath appears as an unlikely hero.

Angus heard voices. Literally. Voices that echoed in his head and told him what to do. He thought they literally came from God, and did literally everything that they said. Right now his voices were literally being confusing. But first a word from our sponsors:

"NOW! The new improved breakfast cereal! Post Posties! The cereal that doesn't deliver the goods! Safe for the whole family! You might as well eat the box!"

Angus' voices literally loved America, and New York especially. They didn't want New York to die. "Don't let them get your wheatsky!" they told him.

"Okey-Dokey!" submitted Angus.

The next day President Ford showed up at Angus' door. Literally. "Hey Angus old buddy!" said Ford suppressing a shudder of disgust: "How about giving us all your wheatsky for Russia!"

"Eat Lead, gook! said Angus, drawing himself up to his full height. Staring into Ford's belt buckle, he repeated: "No way, Jose!"

"All right," sighed Ford, "have it your way." He literally whistled shrilly. Suddenly Angus was surrounded by a considerable number of large ugly men with short hair, jutting ridges over their eyes, and rubber hoses. He raised all three arms in defence, but it was to no avail. He was caught and dragged off, singing "You take the high road and I'll take the 401!" The men giggled. Ford literally giggled.

The press were literally aghast. "We're aghast" they cried. America was up in arms, but Ford wouldn't budge. "My guys can lick your guys" he literally taunted.

Stalemate. But then Angus' voices literally spoke again. "Vanish!" they said. So he did. This was easy for a Martian. He reappeared in Moscow, from which he was thrown into Siberia, for not coming through with his wheatsky.

For a month he worked, still singing: "Besame, besame mucho! Each time I look in your eyes, I see my reflection!" The other prisoners threw him out.

On his own he wandered, lost and literally alone. His voices returned: "Go back to your wife, and pick up a quart of cream on the way."

So he did. Upon re-entry he was arrested. He was being shown the ways of the world, but he literally rejected them.

How can a jerk like hom save the free World? We'll see.

Nuclear power:

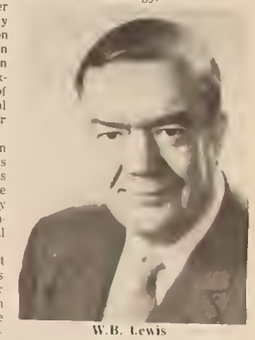
"Days of low cost energy are not over; but lie ahead"

Barb Nyland

"The days of low cost energy are not over, but lie a little way ahead." This is the opinion of Dr. W. B. Lewis, former senior vice-president of science at the Atomic Energy of Canada and one of the men instrumental in the development of the Candu nuclear reactor.

Dr. Lewis, now a member of the Physics department, was invited to Queen's after his retirement from the AECL in 1973. He uses Queen's as his base while he travels to many countries advising them on matters related to nuclear energy and tries to convince them of the tremendous potential nuclear energy has as a tool of peaceful human existence. Dr. Lewis' official title at Queen's is 'Distinguished Professor of Science'.

According to Dr. Lewis the cost of nuclear power would be less than that obtained from coal, oil, natural gas or hydro. It is well known that the supply of these resources is limited. On the contrary Candu reactors, using natural uranium as its fuel could supply the world with sufficient energy for thousands of years.



Hesitation to use this type of energy is based primarily on the fact that a by-product of the reaction producing the energy in the Candu reactors is plutonium, a primary constituent of atomic bombs. "Avoiding nuclear warfare is essential" emphasizes Dr. Lewis. Yet he does not feel that western nations can justify keeping from underdeveloped countries the means by which they can obtain a decent life. The harnessing of nuclear fission energy would provide sufficient food, warmth, fresh water and fresh air for years to come.

People opposed to nuclear energy claim that is will increase the pollution of our environment. Radioactive wastes such as the plutonium used in the bomb can be encased in a solid from which it cannot escape and then be buried. "Plutonium is extremely easy to contain for millions of years and it has practically all decayed by its natural radioactivity in only a quarter of a million years "stated Dr. Lewis. According to Dr. Lewis we now have all the technology necessary to handle any of the wastes from the production of nuclear energy.

The elimination of poverty and hunger through the use of nuclear energy can only be accomplished through the co-operation and mutual respect among all the human beings in the world. "How soon we can muster the love and loyalty on the extensive scale needed to benefit the whole of humankind and its ecology is the moral issue concerning nuclear power development" stated Dr. Lewis.

Dr. Lewis is presently the Canadian representative to the United Nations Scientific Advisory Committee. He was the co-winner of the Atoms for Peace Award in 1967 in recognition of his many years of work in the effort to develop international co-operation in the beneficial use of atomic energy.

When he retired in 1973 an annual award called the W B.Lewis Medal was established by the Canadian Nuclear Association. It is given to Canadian scientists or engineers who demonstrate technical competence and accomplishment in the field of nuclear science and technology.

Spending review urges 65% tuition hike

Last spring, Premier Davis commissioned a small group representing the private and public sectors to suggest ways of cutting back spending. The report of the Special Program Review appeared late last week and the authors are busy explaining and defending it.

From the private sector, members of the board were Maxwell Henderson, the former Auditor-General, broadcaster Betty Kennedy, and General Foods Ltd. President Robert Hurlbut. Ontario Treasurer, Darcy McKeough, was the chairman. Government representatives were senior deputy ministers.

Of direct interest to students is the recommendation that university and community college fees be boosted by 65 per cent. The idea is in keeping with the philosophy of the report, "Let the user pay". A 65 per cent increase would put most of Queen's tuition fees at $990.

Other university-related proposals include cutting the maximum grant available from $3,200 to $2,200 and raising the loan portion from $800 to $1,800. The alternative to tuition increases would be drastic cuts in total university staff.

Craig Brown, Queen's OFS delegate, commented to the Journal on the student-related aspects of the report. "If they (the government) up tuition fees, access to university goes out the window. It means they're not listening to arguments that there is a financial barrier and that OSAP doesn't do a great deal towards mitigating that barrier."

Brown recognizes the political expediency for the government of cutting back on the universities. The effects of the cutback are not visible to a majority of citizens and the universities claim a large part of the budget. "Nobody can understand why universities can't implement the plans," he said. They look simple enough to effect when they're written in a report but the long-term effects of a high teacher-student ratio are not so easily understood. The popular image of students on a four-year lark is being exploited by the government.

The OFS has said that the only things that work are public meetings, rallies and demonstrations to protest proposed tuition fee increases.

The report affects more than just post-secondary students - another prominent proposal concerns civil servants. The report suggests that they be made to earn the merit pay increases that are presently handed out automatically on a length-of-service basis. Henderson said that deciding whether a civil servant deserved a merit pay increase would be easy. His boss would judge it "by the way he does his work".

The report also suggests that parks be supported entirely by the fees they collect. Patients should pay $2 more for every visit to a doctor, and costs of private and semi-private hospital beds should jump. Two hundred Ministry of Education employees should be fired, according to the report.

Mr. McKeough said that productivity and affordability will be placed at the core of economic planning in Ontario. Throughout the 402-page report, the words "reduction, cancellation, and postponement" appear frequently. The words are expected to be indicative of government planning for the next few years.

SVB News

The Seminar last Thursday, on Juvenile Deliquents (see story on separate page) was an unqualified success. Our thanks to our speakers Judge Thompson and Ms. Hackett and all those who were in attendance. We remind those who would like further information on volunteer Juvenile Probation to stop by our office and talk to Pam.

SVB will be hosting another Seminar after January 1st, and we'd like suggestions as to topics. Stop by the office or call between 12:30-4:30 pm (547-5766).

Thank you to those who have signed up as volunteers during the last month - we've hit the 200 mark!

Thank you to the students who voted "yes" to the 75cent social service fee. We are demonstrating to the community of Kingston that Queen's students are truly interested in their city!

What can you do to help in Kingston with only two weeks of classes left? Skating, swimming, scouts, brownies, guides, recreation programmes. Whenever students come up to the office and have a look in "The Book" they are surprised at the number of agencies in need of volunteers! Come on up and have a look at "The Book"!

Once again we remind you to stop by the office and pick up your Newsletter! We're in the Grey House, see you there - 2nd floor - 12:30 to 4:30 pm.

If you would like any campus events listed in What's Happening, please send it to What's Happening, c-o Journal.

If you see this fellow at a door late some night, don't be alarmed. John Bryant is one member of the new student-staffed security patrol that roams campus at night. The patrol replaces Hawthorne security.

Typing service loss may hit $3500

Giles Gherson

The AMS typing service is losing business Such was the report from Paul Steep, Vice President, (Operations). By the end of October, service had dropped off considerably from last year This trend appears to have continued through November, and Steep predicted that "We're going to make a substantial loss this year," perhaps one "equivalent to the salary of one typist - $3500."

No one is sure why students are not bringing the service as much work this year, so this year, so the AMS is "stepping up an ad campaign," said Steep.

Because Steep is not sure whether the AMS can sustain the predicted deficit, he has asked Outer Council to evaluate the situation.

Paul Steep also announced that because of the referendum results, the Students Interest Fee will be raised next year by $17 15. The referendum passed all proposals for increasing fees.

During Question Period, Rector Bruce Trotter pointed out that for the AMS to allow such a Student Interest Fee increase was inconsistent with the Society's policy of "universal accessibility." He complained that the AMS made no pre-referendum policy statement to this effect.

Ian Nordheimer answered Trotter's point by saying that while the Inner Council explained the issues to the students before the referendum it "doesn't have a mandate to force the issues one way or another." As Peter Lane, External Affairs Commissioner explained, the point of holding a referendum is "to give students the right to decide" on issues Lane did, however, recognize the contradiction between the official AMS policy and the fee raise.

In his External Allairs report, Lane announced the estallishment of an OFS Office in the north west corner of the Union The same room houses the Women's Office and the Camp Outlook Office.

Craig Brown, Queen's Chief OFS Delegate, said that the purpose of the office is to give the OFS "a centre on this campus," making the organization more of "a visible and real thing" to students.

The office will house reports, research documents and other OFS information sources and have them available for general use It will also serve as a permanent home for the Queen's OFS Committee

Three student PCs elected to leadership convention

A delegation of three Queen's students will represent the Queen's Progressive Conservative Campus Association at the Progressive Conservative Leadership Convention to be held in Ottawa in mid-February. The delegates, elected at the association meeting Thursday night are : Gloria Thomson, Doug Bonnell, and Robert Welch.

According to Ruth Ranson, a Past President of the Queen's PC's and current Secretary of the Kingston and the Islands PC Association, the youth representation at the convention will be substantial; it is estimated that 40 per cent of the delegates will be under thirty years of age. Campus associations from across Canada are allowed three delegates to the leadership convention; in addition, two of the six delegates elected from each of the riding associations must be under thirty.

Flora Macdonald, MP for Kingston and the Islands, will be vying for the Progressive Conservative Leadership at the convention. There is at present, according to Ranson, a movement on campus actively supporting Flora Macdonald's candidacy.

The meeting to elect the delegates from the Kingston and the Islands Progressive Conservative Association will be held tomorrow at 8 p.m in the Kingston Hockey Hall of Fame and is open to anyone interested in attending.

New commissioner

Sharon Reynolds, a second year English major, recently has been appointed AMS Internal Affairs Commissioner The position was left vacant when Paul Steep, former Internal Affairs Commissioner, rose to the position of Vice-President (Operations) on November 13

Earlier this term, Reynolds applied for the position but was turned down in favour of Steep Her appointment last week was based on the interview held at that time, she said

Due to the short length of time left in the office (the new Executive term begins March 1), Reynolds said she hopes to "continue with the existing Commission activities and to build on these."

Juvenile laws re-considered

Submitted by SVB

On November 20th, about 70 people attended the Student Volunteer Bureau Seminar on "Juvenile Delinquents - the System and the Changing Laws." It was a great success. Judge George Thompson of Juvenile and Family Court discussed the current laws governing children in conflict with the law - a law that is nearly 60 years old! Also discussed were proposed changes which will treat children more like adults; i.e. their civil rights will be further recognized. There are many problems with the present system, one example is that children who have been sent to Training School by a judge are released, not at a time suggested by the judge, but at a time suggested by the Training School and approved by a Committee in Toronto.

However, children in Kingston are luckier than those in some other areas, if they are in conflict with the law, as there are several innovative programmes that help the child remain in the community - a Diversion Programme, a Restitution Programme, a Volunteer Juvenile Probation programme and a Group Home

These programmes are in operation because of the basic philosophy held by Judge Thompson that the least intervention should be attempted first, with Training Schools used only for children who are a danger to themselves and-or the community.

Donna Hackett discussed her role as a Volunteer Juvenile Probation Officer - a one-to-one match which is arranged at the suggestion of the Diversion Committee or the Court. As well, Ms. Hackett related her experiences while involved in a summer research project in Ontario Training Schools. There are 725 children in Training School in this province, some of whom have not broken the law, but have committed a 'No-No' i.e., truancy, unmanageability, or promiscuity (which are not criminal offences). A project has been submitted to the Ontario Ministry of Correctional Services requesting an 'Ombudsman' for children in Training Schools.

To those who attended the seminar, it appears that the system is changing for children in conflict with the law, in Ontario. This was a great opportunity for Queen's to learn about children from people who are involved in the "evolving" and changing system. The children of Kingston are fortunate to have Thompson, Hackett and others concerned about their welfare and actively working to change the system.

Health Sciences lecture on heart disease epidemic

Richard Pidutti

Western society is now in the midst of an epidemic for which the remedy is known. Cardiovascular diseases, those ailments affecting the heart and blood vessels, account for 52 percent of the deaths in Canada and are the major cause of death in most industrialized countries

Heart disease was the subject of the second Health Science Rounds lecture held last Thursday.

"The high incidence of death is incredible considering that we are able to prevent the progression of atherosclerosis, the disease that accounts for nearly 80 percent of cardiovascular related deaths" commented Richard Pidutti a first year medical student "The North American life style is killing us" he added

The prevalence of atherosclerosis was attributed to smoking, hypertension, high fat diets, physical inactivity and emotional stress

Alex McLaren, a third year medical student emphasized that the damage cannot be repaired once the disease produces any symptoms. Prevention is the only way to attack this problem he said

The first objective of a physiotherapist is to assist the heart attack or post-operative heart patient to breath properly and to clear their lungs in order to prevent chest infections. Their job is also to get the patient back on his feet stated Court Thomson, a third year physiotherapy student

Occupational therapists assess the abilities of the patient and thereby determine whether they are able to return to their jobs Carol Harwood from fourth year occupational therapy spoke of the occupational therapists importance in teaching the patients how to do daily activities without imposing greater demands on their heart.

Tree planting on Thursday

Paula Luck

This Thursday and Friday the trees dug up by the 'Project Green Tree Diggers' will finally be delivered to Queen's. As you will recall, these trees were dug and balled by a group of 20 student volunteers some time ago, in October

The soil has at last frozen enough around the roots so that they can be safely transported from Shawville Quebec to Queen's Starting Thursday morning, these 16 black spruce will fill those mud holes you have been dodging for the last two months between Ontario and Kingston Halls. An official planting ceremony is scheduled for 1:00 p.m on Friday, weather permitting This will mark the completion of Phase 1 of the Students' Project Green

Queen's on the air

Terry Collins

In 1922, a Queen's student signalled the beginning of radio broadcasting in Kingston by playing a coronet solo. Later that year, a play by play description of a Queen's-McGill game was transmitted by telephone from Richardson Stadium directly onto the air. The broadcast was heard in Ottawa, Picton, Colburne and in parts of northern New York. So began CFRC.

Students taking the Queen's Summer Radio Course at CFRC in 1947.

CFRC (which reportedly stands for Canada's Famous Rugby Champions, Queen's having won the Grey Cup that year) received its first commercial licence to broadcast in 1923 at a cost of $100. It was the second radio station in Canada and only one of four in North America (Westinghouse began broadcasting first in 1920 from Pittsburg). The station was built by some engineering professors to use as a teaching aid Professors Jemmett, Hughes, Davis and Geiger (as in Geiger counter) designed and built the first equipment. The studio was located in Fleming Hall and soundproofing was accomplished using flannelette sheets. In 1923, they were broadcasting mainly sports, speeches, music and news from the Queen's Journal staff. In 1925, dance music from Grant Hall was transmitted. This led to the establishment of lines being run into other parts of the campus.

Around 1930, an early morning test signal from CFRC produced responses from as far away as B C and Oklahoma City (one source claims that an operator in Australia picked up the signal as well)

The experimental station joined forces in 1936 with the Whig Standard which supplied the news and advertising. Three years earlier a fire had destroyed the station's equipment which was rebuilt in a year. Programs listed in 1939 included The Happy Gang, Jack Benny, Edgar Bergan and Charlie McCarthy, Church of the Wildwood, Heart Throbs of the Hills, Al Donahue's Orchestra, Vic and Sade, and "The Light Up and Listen Club".

CFRC and the Whig Standard brought radio news to Kingston throughout the war until 1942, when the Whig broke off and formed CDWS (Kingston Whig-Standard). Some of the claims being made in the advertisments for patent medicines were offensive to the medical faculty. Advertising was dropped and all operating costs were borne by the university

Between 1945 and 1948, the CBC used the Queen's facilities for training purposes during the summer. The Drama Guild began broadcasting weekly plays and two nights were used for transmission. In 1950, listeners heard, "From high atop Fleming Hall, the Radio Workshop of the Queen's Drama Guild.. brings you another four hours of Queen's On The Air." with music, interviews, discussions, commentaries, sports and 'Journal on the Air' as well as a half hour play.

In 1972, CFRC's 50th anniversary, Lorne Greene (Arts '38) was heard over CFRC congratulating the station. "Out here on the Ponderosa range we're a little out of range of CFRC, but in a half century of service a radio station's reputation sure gets around" Anniversary greetings were also broadcast by Betty Kennedy, Gordon Sinclair, Bob Hesketh and the late Jack Donnell.

CFRC still provides a great deal of classical music, but programming now includes free form rock shows such as 'Nocturne' "The Alternate Sound" to Kingston's commercial AM background noise is appreciated by many Source material for this column was found in the files of the Alumni Association and CFRC Our sincere appreciation is extended to Mr. Murray Gill, Mr. Herb Hamilton and the staff of CFRC for their generous assistance during the production of this column.

AMS Court decision on Gray

Aesculapian Society vs A.M.S. Outer Council

Heard before Wells, Chief Justice, Yearsley, Associate Chief Justice, Dawkins, Knight and Minns,, Junior Justices on November 3, 1975.
R. MaeKnight, G. Maxwell, and D. Carter for the complainant
I. Nordheimer and J. Avis for the respondent
The unanimous decision of the Court is given by Wells, C.J.

This action is brought by the Aesculapian Society to protest a ruling of the Outer Council by which that body purported to confirm John Gray in his position as A.M.S. president despite his loss of student status. This decision of the Outer Council was made after the Speaker's ruling (that the motion was unconstitutional) had itself been overruled using the provisions of Bylaw 23 (1:2).

It was first objected by the respresentatives for Outer Council that this action was improperly brought. It was pointed out that Bylaw 11 section 1 (second a) clearly sets out that the AMS Court is responsible for the interpretation of the AMS Constitition "on request of the Outer Council". It was argued that this section was exclusionary and only Outer Council could bring an action in which the Court's primary task was interpretation of the Constitution. The Court is unable to accept this view. Few actions brought before the AMS Court could avoid reference to the Constitution. To assert that such actions depend upon the Court's first finding that the question is not primarily constitutional is to impose a most uncertain and unnecessary restriction upon the right of members to bring matters befor the Court.

The Court rather takes the view that Bylaw 11 s 1 (second a) was meant to give the Court the power to decide hypothetical questions referred to it by Outer Council in order to clarify points before the lack of clarity actually causes problems. Where an actual problem arises through a difference of interpretation no person should be denied the opportunity to vindicate his rights merely because the Court must first look at the Constitution to determine what those rights are. The Court thus decides that no action that could otherwise be brought under Bylaw 11 section 1 (second b, second e, d, e, or f) is barred because it involves questions of constitutional interpretation so long as the person bringing the action can demonstrate that the questions arise in fact and are not merely hypothetical.

To determine the effect of a loss of student status upon the right to hold the office of President it is necessary to examine the Bylaws of the AMS, Inc., of which the AMS Constitution is only Bylaw 3. Section 17 of Corporate Bylaw 1 confers upon the Board of Directors the power to determine membership in the Corporation. The only other determination of membership is Article II of the AMS Constitution which is subordinate to the general power of the Board of Directors. It is clear that at the time of his election, John Gray was an Ordinary Member by virtue of Article II section 2 c. It was contended that since membership on the Board of Directors requires membership in the Corporation, it followed that election to the Board of Directors serves to automatically confer Corporate membership as well. In the case of John Gray he would have been an Ordinary Member by virtue of Article II s 2c and some sort of "Special member" by virtue of his election to the Board of Directors. This argument is untenable for two reasons. It renders meaningless the requirement of Corporate Bylaw 1 s 3a that all new members of the Board must be made members of the Corporation within ten (10) days of their election to the Board; if they did not possess such membership beforehand. It also results in giving to the General Meeting a power to confer membership without an express grant from the Board of part of their Bylaw 1 section 17 power

John Gray's only membership in the AMS was that of Ordinary Member which he held as a result of his status as an intramural student of Queen's University. Since Ordinary Membership arises only from one's status as an intramural student, it follows that John Gray's loss of student status resulted in loss of his AMS membership.

If a person were a non-student member of the AMS, under the present terms of the Constitution could that person occupy the office of President? At present there are four classes of membership in the AMS, Inc.:Member Societies, Ordinary Members, Honorary Members, and those special members who obtain their membership directly from the Board of Directors. Obviously a society cannot occupy the post, so one need only examine the entitlement of Honorary, Ordinary and special members to hold office. Article III s 1 sets out the rights of Honorary Members while Article III s 2 sets out the rights of Ordinary Members. The rights of Ordinary Members described in s2c are those also possessed by Honorary Members; if there is to be any distinction between the two classes of membership it therefore follows that the rights of Ordinary Members set out in ss 2a, 2b and 2d cannot also be rights of Honorary Members. Clearly then, an Honorary Member cannot hold office in the AMS. The rights of special members depend on the terms specified by the Board of Directors in each case where it is granted; while the right of Ordinary Members to hold office is specified to be "subject to the restrictions of the office". The answer to the question of whether a non-student may be President must lie in the terms of that office.

John Gray

The Court was urged strongly by the representatives of Outer Council to have regard to the spirit and not the words of the Constitution in deciding that question. We agree, and take note of the following facts: 1) at present there are no special members of the AMS who have been given the right to hold office in the Society (as opposed to being members of the Board of Directors. 2) at present Honorary Members have no right to hold office. 3) at present only students may be Ordinary Members. There are also two parts of the AMS Constitution and Bylaws which bear indirectly on the point Article I s 3 states that the "objects of the A.M.S. shall be: 1) To advance the interests of the students of Queen's University. b) To serve as a medium of communication between the students and the governing bodies of the University. c) To encourage an awareness in the students of their responsibilities in the national and international University community." The general tenor of the document, which Article I s 3 reflects, is that the AMS is an organization for the benefit of the students of Queen's University run by the students of this University. It is worth noting also that Bylaw 8 s 3a states that the President and Vice-Presidents "shall be elected from the student body at large". The question is whether this means "shall be a student at the time of his election" or "shall be a student during his term of office". While the answer is certainly not obvious, the Court is of the opinion that the latter meaning is correct. It is significant that the Business Administrator of the AMS, the chief non-student executive of the Corporation, is by Bylaw 8 s 7 still responsible to Outer Council. The ultimate control, short of the Board of Directors, is still in the hands of students. The intent seems to be that the chief officers of the Society should be members of the AMS on an equal footing with those they represent. Whether this is wise is not for the Court to decide; all we can say is that the spirit and the words of the document indicate that the office should be held by a student

The Court, having decided that the Presidency was vacant because John Gray was neither a student nor even a member of the AMS, was strongly urged to suggest some way in which John Gray could be put back into that office until the end of his original term. It was stated by the representatives of Outer Council that it was grossly unfair to remove the incumbant before his term had expired. The Court cannot agree with this submission for two reasons. First, this action did not serve to "remove" John Gray from office; it only decided whether the office was vacant because John Gray was no longer qualified to fill it. Second, while some might feel it is "unfair" that John Gray is unable to continue as President in the present circumstances, a far greater injustice would be done to the Society as a whole if the AMS Court were to rewrite the Constitution every time it felt its operation was "unfair". After considering various suggestions, such as suspending our decision (which was rejected without submissions being heard), and having the Board of Directors retroactively declare John Gray a member and qualified to hold the office, the Court proposed the following. Three impediments stand in the way of John Gray's being put back into the office of President. 1) he is not a member of the AMS, 2) he is not a student, and 3) he is not presently the President. To remove the first impediment the Court suggested that Outer Council delegate someone to present a motion to the special General Meeting to the effect that the General Meeting request the Board of Directors make John Gray an Ordinary Member using their Corporate Bylaw 1 s 17 power. To remove the second impediment the Outer Council delegate would move that an ad hoc amendment to Bylaw 8 s 3 be made to specifically permit a non-student to hold the office of President. To remove the third impediment the Court felt the procedure set out in Bylaw 8 s 3d should be followed. In this way the three policy determining bodies of the AMS, Inc., the student body at large, the Outer Council, and the Board of Directors would be directly involved in putting John Gray back in office. While other constitutionally valid alternatives might be possible, this proposal ensures that the legitimacy of John Gray in the office would be beyond question. As well, if any of these bodies were unwilling to permit him to hold the office, it is only proper that it should be left with the opportunity to exercise its right. Each has a role in determining the future course of the AMS, and the right to do so must not be interfered with by this Court or any other group or individual.

In closing the Court wishes to draw attention to the present state of the AMS Constitution and its relation to the Corporate Bylaws and the Letters Patent. To say the least the situation is confused; in the Court's opinion unnecessarily so. At the least this problem should be considered by the Constitutional Review Committee provided for in section 7 of Bylaw 5. The affairs of the AMS, in our opinion, are too important to be governed by a structure as confusing as the one in existance.

Bill Detucia Pub Manager

The Queen's pub plays a very fundamental role here on campus, providing an atmosphere in which students may gather together for a social evening or afternoon of good times and good conversation. Yet there is a great deal of work and responsibility involved in the organization of this activity, a lot of which goes by unnoticed. Bill DeLucia, a third year law student here at Queen's, fulfills the necessary activities of pub manager, and does a good job of it.

For instance, there have been some perhaps subtle, but no doubt essential, changes made in the Queen's pub over the past few months. Students noticed the shabby condition of the carpet upstairs, and complained about the dull effect created by bare walls. Downstairs in Wallace, a need for improvement was recognized as well, mainly in the quality of the music provided.

Initially aware of these problems, and reinforced by student concern, Bill has made it his policy to remain as open-minded and responsible as possible when dealing with "consumer demand and consumer complaint". Evidence of this may be found in the new carpeting and graphic art designs now installed in the House of Commons, and the improved sound system and wider selection of music tapes in Wallace Hall. Even though it was argued that we the students were soon to move into a new drinking establishment, and that hence these improvements were unnecessary, the basic philosophy of trying to create as good an atmosphere as possible has led Bill and his two pub assistants, Ron Knox and Jim Russell, to draw on the funds of a successful summer operation in order to pump back into the student body those advantages which their money can provide. Groups as well are justified by the financial success of the previous month, and it is under hopeful speculation that this entertainment might soon be provided twice a month on a regular basis. An average of $5,000 dollars per month finds its way back to some students in the form of staff wages; hence the pub as a good source of employment must also be recognized as one of its positive factors.

Bill DeLucia holds a very personal attitude towards the smooth operation of the Queen's pub, and feels that opinions channelled directly through him are those most likely to be assured results. His position as manager, along with the responsibilities attributed to a married, third year law student, totally consume his time and efforts. Although previously involved with legal aid services within the community, his work load at present is just too demanding for any further committments. An easy person to talk to, and more than approachable should an issue or problem arise, Bill contributes to those things which he is involved with to the best of his abilities, and is a necessary asset to the Queen's community.

Something about nothing

Dear Editors:

I have nothing to say. But I have said that I have nothing to say. What is more, I have said that I have said that I have nothing to say. Either I have something to say or I have not got something to say. If the former, then I should say it, and if the latter, then I guess I should keep silent.

Actually, I am just being verbose. I have taken an entire paragraph to say nothing. I started with nothing and built a logical construction on nothing. A logical construction on nothing is nothing. Therefore, I am verbose.

I am also being pedantic, having just spent forty six words to explain why I was being verbose. If I spent a whole paragraph to say that I had nothing to say, then it is self evident that I was being verbose. If it is self evident, then I guess there was no real need for me to explain why I was being verbose. If I draw fine lines of distinction upon that which is self evident, then I am being pedantic.

I have nothing to say That, at least, should be obvious by now. If I did have something to say, I would have already said it. Since I haven't, it can be assumed that I have nothing to say.

But am I really telling the truth when I say I have nothing to say? Nobody in his right mind who has nothing to say spends this much time explaining why they have nothing to say. I could be trying to pull some kind of confidence trick. I could be trying to get out of saying anything by expounding upon why I have nothing to say. I do have something to say, but I'm just not going to say it.

And yet, I have said nothing. When I say that I really have something to say otherwise I would not have gone to so much trouble to explain why I didn't, am I telling the truth? When I say that I am pulling some kind of confidence trick, am I just trying to bluff you into believing that I know something that you don't know, when in fact I do not? If I am trying to pull a confidence trick, who am I trying to kid and for what reasons? I could be trying to kid you for reasons that I'm not going to let you know. If I have reasons for trying to kid you, then I must have something to say. Therefore, I am telling the truth when I say that, in spending so much time explaining why I have nothing to say, I am trying to pull some kind of confidence trick.

I say that I am telling the truth when I say I am playing a confidence trick. But if I am prone to playing confidence tricks, how can anyone know whether or not I am playing a confidence trick when I say that I am telling the truth when I say that I am playing a confidence trick?

Actually, I am just trying to be one of those 'pseudo intellectual' type people. I am trying to show off my logical prowess, when in fact I have nothing to say. I really hope that, by covering up the transparency in my argument with so much confusion and mystification, no one will see through it. But the confusion and mystification is really inside my mind and nowhere else.

To be brief and to the point, let it be known that I have nothing to say.

IRC rules in Leonard cafe

Dear Editors,

Sometime ago you printed a letter from the president of ArtSci '78 regarding the Inter-Residence Council's actions in the booking of Leonard Cafeteria. This letter is to inform students of Queen's of IRC policy in this matter.

During the academic year, the IRC gives the final approval to bookings of the Cafeteria. It is required that groups wishing to use the Cafeteria abide by all conditions and restrictions set down in the official policy for booking of the Cafeteria. The group must also agree to adhere to any additional restrictions which the Council sees fit to impose before it approves a particular event. If the Council feels that a group is failing to meet all the agreed-upon conditions, it will cancel the event, at any time prior to, or during the event.

Leonard Cafeteria is a Residence facility which outside groups have the privilege of using. Leonard Field residents are always considered first in the IRC's decisions. After them, come other Queen's students and faculty groups and groups from Kingston.

Finally, for the reader's information: ArtSci '78 was required to post a $400.00 performance bond less that 24 hours before their event. Not all of it will be returned due to damages resulting from the event. The IRC makes no money from the bookings of the Cafeteria.

Mr. Overchuck was elected to the position of Chairman of the Inter-Residence Council.

Finally, the chairman has the option of cancelling an event without consulting the Council, although Mr. Overchuck chose not to act on his own in this instance.

J. A. MacDiarmid, Vice-Chairman, Inter-residence Council.

Smoke issue smoulders on

Dear Editors,

After 3½ years at this university, I finally have been prompted to make an appeal for action from the general student body.

The trigger was the article in the Journal on Friday, Nov 21, entitled "So What Can You Do?", by Michael Walker. Mr. Walker makes a series of suggestions to help reduce the suffering imposed on us non-smokers by the inconsideration of smokers.

I wish to take the issue much further, by suggesting that the time has come for the non-smoking majority on this campus to institute an outright ban on smoking in all lectures, seminars, labs, etc. This has recently been accomplished at Carleton, and I would like to thiok we could (and definitely should!) do it here.

I personally have recently been making my feelings known in seminars, and have found other non-smokers expressing their agreement and gratitude when the butts were crushed. I am a tutor, and have disallowed smoking in all of the hourly sessions I hold - again agreement was voiced. In addition I do not allow smoking in my home, car or office here at Queen's.

As D.S.C. Chairman for Sociology, I plan to bring the issue to our department head, and press for at least a localized ban. Along with this I would be glad to help carry the issue to the university at large. As a first step I invite the response of all interested students in all departments. Letters and the like can be left for me at the Sociology D.S.C. office in Macintosh-Corry, Room D329 - just shove them under the door if I'm not there.

Let's get something done about this! Smokers do not have the right to rob the rest of us of our air. Stop coughing up your sleeve! Speak out!

Public's right to decide

Dear Editors,

Re: Ian McLean's letter, Friday, November 21, 1975.

Richard Nixon (paraphrased): 'Acting illegally is wrong - that is, unless adequate reason backs such action. Reducing the offensiveness of this 'Watergate problem' was reason enough.'

Ian McLean: 'Vandalism of art is wrong unless adequate reason backs the vandalism. Reducing the offensiveness of this work (Pollution sculpture)... was reason enough.'

Question: Why doesn't the public have the right to decide what the 'public good' is?

Andrew Mason.

Two brands of prejudice

Dear Editors,

The unacknowledge article in Friday's edition of the Journal headed "Abuse of Women: fiction or not?" describes two events supposedly reminiscent of sexism. The theme is however, obscured, for the author illustrates it with a situation which is perhaps more aptly explained in other terms.

She describes an occurence where herself, a Portuguese person, was shunned in her attempts to be friendly by inviting herself to sit with two other women in a bar. The second example recites a scenario where two women drinking in a bar are hustled by a guy whose advances are unwanted; the girls ask a waiter to remove the fellow, the fellow becomes angry at their rejection and upsets the waiter's tray, causing a disturbance.

Witnesses to the incident described to our author how they felt the women were at fault. These two occurrences, alleges the author, are "sadly typical of our society that in such a situation, women are damned if they do and damned if they don't."

Surely being shunned upon self-invitation to other people's drinking table might well be explained in terms other than sexism? Perhaps the self-invitation was a breach of accepted convention; perhaps the hostile response was an illustration of cultural prejudice.

What is "sadly typical" in this woman's article is a readiness to attribute anything unpleasant to sexism. Before modern day medicine, everyone died of "consumption". Before Liberation becomes unnecessary, will every unpleasant event be sexist? If you feel compelled to preach the inequities of sexism, at least be discriminating lest you transform one type of senseless prejudice into another

What about West Campus?

Dear Editors:

I would like to thank the A.M.S. for their cooperation (finally) in delivering Who's Where to the West Campus. Queen's does not realize the problems for McArthur students getting to Main Campus during office hours. The availability of Who's Where on our campus was much needed and appreciated. Hopefully some kind of permanent policy can be agreed upon for future years.

Secretary, MacArthur Student Society

P.S. How do we get our Tricolors next year? Remember us. We are not that far away.

Comunity Forum

Caring and cooperating for Kingston

Nancy Bowes

After months of preparation, it finally happened last Saturday. No, I'm not referring to the Santa Claus Parade. I'm referring to Community Forum Canada, Kingston.

St Lawrence College was to have been the host to about two hundred concerned citizens who would spend the day diseussing issues facing Kingston and would put forth proposals that might alleviate the situation. The idea was a sound one. It is necessary for the people to gather and talk The day was planned so that it would not be a chaotic rap session It had structure, courtesy of the Institute of Cultural Affairs and a dedicated steering committee. Unfortunately, Community Forum Canada, Kingston did not have the vital ingredient: two hundred concerned citizens. Instead, about thirty people participated

Despite the disappointing numbers, the Community Forum was a worthwhile venture An account of the day is in order.

After registering, participants gathered in the fourth-floor theatre between nine and ten a.m Judith MacKenzie made some introductory comments and led the group in singing a few well-known songs.

Clair Woodbury gave the opening lecture entitled "The New World." Happily, it was more of an informal, keynote speech than a lecture. Woodbury's theme was stated succinctly, early in the talk: 'We live on a world, and we live on it together." He recognized the necessity of caring for the community, and co-operating to make it "a great place to live," rather than just a "passable" place.

The Community Forum is evidence that we are "experiencing community in a new way." We can no longer wait forever for the various governments to act on the issues. We have to do some things for ourselves.

Woodbury was careful to point out that caring for the community is not a rational thing. We are not getting paid for it. His concern stems from a strong desire that there be a habitable community for his children. If we work as a team, with plans, we have a chance for success.

At about 10:30 the group broke into two workshop sessions to brainstorm the issues and arrive at a concise statement about the nature of the issue. The groups were well mixed and showed a sincere concern about relevant community problems.

One group centred on the problem of living within limits. Their challenge statement was as follows: "In the arena of the exploitation of human and natural resources, the underlying challenge is the need for citizens to understand and respect the limits of the environment, both natural and economic, and to live within such limits, which has to do with economic disparity, unemployment, exploitation of natural loeal resources without regard to local human needs and rights."

The lunch-hour included entertainment by the Gadabouts, a senior citizen's choir based in Kingston. The joy that they imparted gave a sense of community to the group

The afternoon session began with another informal talk, this one delivered by Isobel Bishop, on the subject of "The New Human." She expressed frustration at the world that does not consult individuals before making decisions.

Mrs. Bishop's theme was neatly contained in her stating that "our values have become plastic; our values have gone askew."

The new human sees, however, in the midst of the collapse of the plastic values, the opportunity of re-creating a new order.

The workshops met again to bring forth proposals to answer the challenges created in the morning. One such proposal related to access to information:

"We, the citizens of Kingston, in order to publicize specific information, propose to expand knowledge of community resources and data before the public through consulting with public officials, and gathering and publishing community data."

To tie the day together, a small group spent the afternoon session writing a story and a song and devising a slogan and symbol to express the community feeling in Kingston

The proposals and creative works were presented at a plenary session at 4:30. By 5 pm, the event was over.

Because of the wide scope of issues discussed and the small turnout, a few participants were somewhat disappointed. The exercise was valuable, though, if only as a forum for several facets of Kingston to meet and talk. Definitive answers should not be expected, but it is trying when tangible results are not attained. Perhaps thirty people in Kingston now have a glimpse into the tension in which we all must live if we will refuse to accept the snap decisions of yesterday.

Roller-coaster enrolment predicted

Adapted from Waterloo Gazette

The number of students at universities and colleges in Canada is still going up, and will hit a peak in 1982, according to a Statistics Canada analyst. However, a ten-year drop will follow, and enrolment will bottom out in 1992, not returning to its present level until 1998.

Will post-secondary institutions plan now to handle the 1982 peak, and have too many people and buildings a few years later, or will they keep the 1982 trough in mind and be over-crowded for the next fifteen years?

The population forecast based on many statistics says that the number of Canadians aged 18 to 24, now about 295 million, will be up to 3.34 million in 1982 before dipping down to 2.60 million in 1992. It will be back up again to 3.28 million in 2001.

Zoltan Zsigmond of Statistics Canada points out that "the non-compulsory nature of post-secondary education requires that attention be given to special factors that may have a bearing on enrolment". The share of people aged 18 to 24 who are students has increased from 10.6 per cent fourteen years ago to 19.2 per cent last year, and Zsigmond predicts that it will rise a little more, to 20 per cent, and then level off.

That means that enrolment which was 567,5000 in 1974 will rise to 670,000 in 1982, then fall to 520,000 by 1992 and recover to 660,000 by 2000.

Universities and colleges can choose between having more students than they can handle for the next seven years, and building to handle the 1982 peak and then having more facilities than they need.

Zsigmond cites several results of the coming fluctuation.

+ Faculties "in which enrolment is determined by the availability of facilities" (medicine) will not suffer a drop in enrolment.

+ Faculties "in which enrolment depends on economic conditions" (engineering) "will not be strongly influenced by population patterns."

+ General faculties, particularly arts and science, are likely to feel the effects of the population decline The "wave" effect will mean that there is a shortage of freshmen while the number of senior and graduate students increases; later, that number will decline again and there will be an increase in the number of freshmen.

+ There may be strong competition for students between institutions, with a greater emphasis on part-time and continuing education.

+ "More research funding may be sought to make up for some of the money that will be lost through lack of students."

+ "Those whose lives are apt to be most affected by the enrolment decline are teachers...Faced with threats to job seeurity, teachers' associations may become more militant..."

+ "Operating expenditures, in constant dollars, will not change significantly, and definitely will not decline proportionately with enrolment...Expenditures per student will rise."

+ Institutions will have more buildings than they need.

+ There is a prospect of more university graduates coming onto the job market than there is room for, and it may be wise for government to cut down on student assistance to reduce the number of students.

Lottery could raise $50,000

Giles Gherson

Telethons, the sale of posters and sweaters, and the institution of a Queen's Library Lottery, are three proposed methods of raising money from alumni. The Library Lottery alone could earn the university $50,000.

The AMS Committee Investigating Money-Raising Programs reported to Outer Council last week. The above proposals are part of an effort to induce more student participation in fund-raising.

"Students could make an active contribution to the alumni programs," said the report.

Student help is needed to operate the volunteer-run telethons. Held last year in Kingston, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto - areas of greatest concentration of Queen's graduates - the telethons are used to supplement the "Direct Mail Program." Last year, 26,000 of Queen's 35,000 graduates were contacted by mail.

One new program being studied by the Alumni Office is the "Class Agent Program". The program requires selecting a member of each graduating class to "be responsible for contacting fifty of his class members to communicate news of Queen's financial need, and a specific appeal for support." This more personal approach anticipates "an increase in participation and dollars raised."

The report notes the significant contribution made to the University by alumni who give about $600,000 per year. Committee chairman, Jim Henderson, acknowledged also the substantial contribution made by the Parents' Association, which "has raised somewhere in the region of $20,000" since 1973.

Before the Dark

Scintillae, fragrance, voices between the shadow in that cedar forest before my dark recovered at the long day's end like the maiden silence of blackberries in the sun

as the wind again gathers between the human image on the pale lake, whose fear is sustained in the mountain shadow divided, returning, as clouds across the yellow moon were followed deeper into the forest: though they are lost in the silence before the night ends, the last uncertainty, in a memory of rain–

Matthew Mark and Luke and John–

the voices continue till they are recovered again like blackberries at the edge of this train between the shadow and the shadow glittering:
sunlight rainfall darkness dawn.

For Death (which drifts through the wilderness)

Through dark-silent windows
There is a void–
Cold as bronze leaves under the maple.

Through streets dense with fog-mist and slumber
A village lies solitary–
Cold and lonely in shades of flight.

Through grizzled grey sky, among sparrow branches,
Across country dank with autumn misery,
All winds whisper this name–
Outside the windows.

Come, West

Theatre Passe Muraitte, Toronto's most productive theatre, brings its new play, The West Show to Kingston's McArthur Hall Auditorium on Wednesday 26 November at 8:30 p.m.

The West Show is a collective creation - a play written by the cast members based upon their perceptions of and experiences in Saskatchewan. Paul Thompson's (Passe Muraille's artistic director) style of theatre has a unique Canadian twist. Collective plays weren't invented here, they've been done elsewhere long before, however Thompson has used the method uniquely, and it seems particularly suited to the Canadian experience.

Theatre Passe Muraille is homeless and will probably remain that way. Their home for four years was a marvelously flexible hall in Trinity Square Church It's been demolished to make way for the Eaton Centre development Now Passe Muraille productions move into various free spaces around town. In the summer the company goes to the country to 'make' a new play.

"Theatre isn't a building, it's people," declares Thompson. "Theatre is where you make a play." A short, bearded man with an easy smile and a premature flush of gray, Thompson thoroughly enjoys the lengthy process of 'making' plays. He feels that the free-floating nature of Passe Muraille is an advantage that won't bind the company to any one spot. For the actors the process of 'making' a play can be very strenuous. The pressure upon them is far greater than in a conventional theatre situation In a Paul Thompson production the actors themselves do the writing. They must create the characters and dialogue. It's a long and often painful operation but most of the actors claim it's ultimately very fulfilling.

"I often find it very difficult and frustrating," says Janet Amos, a veteran of many Thompson productions. "But it's also very exciting to be making the choices yourself, to be developing the character. We have to look for the emotional and dramatic content ourselves. When it doesn't come, it's tough."

"Up until three or four years ago," Thompson explains "when you talked about theatre here, you were talking about something that had its energy point somewhere else." Actors work in Thompson productions for ridiculously small wages because they enjoy working with material about themselves. "I feel I'm in the nationalism business in my theatre, and the big theatres are still into imperialism," says Thompson. "We're fed in our work by the things around us while many of the other theatres have their sensibilities imposed from the outside."

"The major limitation of this method," says actor Ted Johns, "is that you're limited to the imagination of the participants. You work out every possible alternative and gradually work it down, refine it. It's a way of thinking."

But as actor Len Peterson says, "One of the great rewards is the chance to do the research, meet the people and develop the input. Because there is a lack of structure at the start, one can become helpless. And if one can't adjust, there's no use continuing. Most of us with Theatre Passe Mursille are attracted to this sort of work and to the subject matter. After we collect the material, we have to devise the methods of presenting it. And that's where you learn to exercise the judgment and the comment.

The West Show, written in Saskatchewan this past summer, is, according to Thompson, "about the west, its history, its heroes, its politics, and the problems of the prairies." Historical figures such as John Diefenbaker, Gabriel Dumont and Louis Riel appear but the fabric of the play is made from the experiences of contemporary Saskatchewan residents.

Tickets at $1.50, $2.50, $3.50 (students), $2.50, $3.50, $4.50 (non-students) are available from the Performing Arts Box Office, Agnes Etherington Art Centre, 547-6191 McArthur Hall Auditorium is at the corner of Union and Sir John A. Macdonald Blvd.

Getting in tune

The Queen's Chamber Orchestra, under the precise direction of Prof. C. Crawley, opened their season with a wide variety of musical styles. Throughout the concert they were plagued with tuning problems, which were unfortunately not resolved until the middle of the second half. This was obviously upsetting to the performers, and resulted in some shaky passages. However, the mood created in most of the works made up for the technical inadequacies.

The symphony lacked the lyricism that one normally expects in Schubert. The slow movement though, far from losing momentum as slow movements often do, got better and better with each return to the main theme. The minuet had several jerks from members of the brass section, who seemed to get carried away by their interesting parts.

The theme of the Bach-Webern fugue had been divided into small motifs, played on different instruments. This made for an effect of total disunity. There was none of the Baroque drive forward that one expects in a fugue. Instead, the piece just seemed to drag on and on. In contrast with the preceding work, The Bach-Holst fugue was executed with confidence and mastery. The entries were well articulated and the fugue built to a dramatic climax.

In spite of technical problems, the performance of the Ives fugue was very convincing. Here was the lyricism and dynamic contrast which was lacking in the Schubert Bennett's Party Piece was a nice selection of different moods and tempos. The connections between the sections were well done, and the soloists showed good feeling for the piece.

Sound of Music

Lacking in romance

Herb Stewart

Musicals must somehow have romance and The Sound of Music which opened last Friday lacked sufficient 'romance'. The spontaneous joy that I have come to expect from musicals was missing and the show suffered for it. I attribute this loss to miscasting, inadequate direction, and inconsistent lighting, costume, and setting. With flaws in these areas, The Sound of Music failed in stimulating that mystical refreshing response that I go to musicals for.

On a more positive note, I praise 'the kids' as they were the most invigorating portion of my evening. I speak of them as a unit because I felt they were a unit. They were the keystone that held the show together. They showed me much poise and stage presence, and a simplicity in acting that other more experienced members of the cast could take a lesson from. For 'the kids', "Bravo!", and I hope that the young talent in Kingston continues to develop.

For the others, I felt that Annabelle McCullough was the best. She captured the warmth and compassion of the Mother Abbess plus the sternness to make her believeable. Jean Callum was somehow not right as Maria. She did not have the look of warmth and youth to be magic for me. I did not believe the love bestowed upon her and this belief is so necessary. Callum sings beautifully but a musical is not totally singing and another actress with that special stage quality of love would have added immensely to the show. Likewise Deryck Hazel does not command the stature of Captain von Trapp, nor the duality of character essential to the role.

I could cite other instances but do not feel it necessary to continue as I think that anyone who sees this production can detect like instances, where the actor regardless of acting ability did not visually possess those personal appearances called for by the role they portrayed.

I blame the director. I should think that Lee Tommarello would take more care in casting. Likewise he should take more care in blocking. Straight lines in blocking are very uninteresting. Furthermore, I know that there is very little motivation in a musical, but there should be some subtlety in blocking so that the whole show does not look as if it has been badly choreographed. There should be some naturalism to help create a romantic illusion.

Care should also be taken in lighting a show. Why was there a spotlight on the singers every time they sang a song? I do not really believe it is necessary to tell an audience, "A singer is singing!" This was a blatant mistake in an otherwise well lit show.

In costuming, there was also misfortunate inconsistency. Costuming was basically good. The one person most out of costume was Debbie Poole (Elsa Schraeder). For a millionaire, her dresses were tawdry and made her look frumpy. There was no costume elegance that the character cried for.

Reg Bronskill did a beautiful job on the outside scenes, perhaps too beautiful. I looked in awe at the portrayed mountains of Austria when I should have been listening to and-or watching the show. It is difficult to evaluate whether or not this was a defect as the beauty was a bright point overall. Other settings such as Maria's bedroom were insufficient. I do not mean that the design was bad, but the visual presentation looked shoddy. Care again seems to be the major fault.

Together all these factors helped to destroy the romantic illusion that musicals have to create to succeed. Musicals are more than just music and songs and with more care The Sound of Music could have sang the music of dreams. I have said enough.

In the storm of Shakespeare

Tom MacGregor

Like the heath storm in King Lear, Shakespeare has impressively raged across campus this weekend. First there was Macbeth (see review below) at Dunning, then the departments of Drama, English and Film presented a Shakespeare weekend with Peter Brooks's King Lear, Franco Zefferelli's The Taming of the Shrew and Orson Wells's Falstaff (Chimes at Midnight).

Saturday night there was a discussion after the film with representatives of each department. As one could have guessed, it boiled down to the Charles Lamb types who felt a visual Shakespeare could never live up to the Skaespeare on the mind against those sensitive to the idea of Shakespeare's genius being in the hands of directors expressing themselves.

Of the two I saw (King Lear and Falstaff) King Lear was the most striking. Brooks has interpreted the play as an absurdist piece very much along the lines of Beckett and Brecht. In Brecht like fashion, Brooks distanced and brutalized the death of Cordelia in order to avoid the pathos Shakespeare intended. This made the most moving scene that of the mad Lear and the blind Gloucester on the beach at Dover. Here the two helpless characters took on the same pathos felt in Waiting for Godot. Visually we are constantly distracted from the meat of the play in favour of the atmosphere. Some scenes are shot with only half the speaker's face in them; some speeches are delivered in such a maze of camera angles that one feels as if he were watching them through the lens machine in an optometrist's office; while at yet other times the picture completely disappears and the audience is alone in a dark theatre with just the sound tract playing. Although this film started quite slowly each scene seems to quicken the pace and make it more and more fascinating.

The Orson Wells film seems to be the best liked among the panel because as Professor Hamilton said, "it was the least like Shakespeare." Here Wells shows off his scholastic side by putting together both Henry IV plays with a bit of Henry V and tying it all together with Holinshed's Chronicles. I hear from the History student friend who accompanied me that this film also had the most realistic and historically accurate battle scenes. (In Polanski's Macbeth, he had armour anywhere from the 11th to the 15th century on his characters.)

Wells returns to favourite theme of the psychology of power. Here the cold respected world of the king which Prince Hal will inherit is contrasted with the warm loyal world that Hal's buddy, Falstaff represents. This climaxes with Hal's betrayal of Falstaff when he ascends the throne showing us how easily one can still use Shakespeare's text and give the totally opposite meaning.

Wells shows an unexpected flair for comedy especially with the material from Henry IV Part I. The parallel robbery and battle scenes showing Falstaff's cowardice and braggardness are hilarious while at the same time endearing us to the character

Of all the film weekends which have cropped up throughout the year I have found this the most enjoyable and would more than be glad to see more.

So fair and foul a Macbeth

Tom MacGregor

"Such fair and foul" a movie I have not seen in many a season as Roman Polanski's version of Shakespeare's Macbeth. Seen at Dunning this week.

This film is amazingly rich visually but like too many cream-puffs it can eventually turn the stomach. Being a MacGregor I should be offended but actually I loved the way he returned to the barbaric past of Scotland. These nobles were so dirty dust flew if they were embraced. Their castles were combination living quarters and stables with dogs taking an equal place at the table. The atmosphere of evil and madness was greatly enhanced by special effects such as the "dagger of the air" which leads Macbeth into Duncan's chambers. On the other hand there were many over indulgences such as the action very unclassically following Macbeth into Duncan's chambers and showing the brutal deed itself. The fact that this was a Playboy production hardly excuses having Lady Macbeth do the "Out damn spot" scene in the nude. Who could give a damn about the spot with such visual tension going on? Worst of all was the massacre of Macduff's family. This left such a bad taste in my mouth I could never fully enjoy the movie afterwards.

Polanski is obsessed with magic and witchcraft so naturally his tour de force was his work with the witches. The movie opens with deserted beach; hands soon appear and start digging -- it is the witches, chanting and burying a severed hand as they go through the prologue. Later we see a covent with fifty of the ugliest hags in Scotland chanting naked over a couldron, dropping in bats, lizards and other crawly paraphernalia. Macbeth drinks the potion and enters a frightening world of vision and prophecy.

With such strength in the visual one almost forgets this is a play by Shakespeare. The language is presented as realistically as possible thus avoiding the fact that it is poetry. All sililoquies are over-dubbed as thoughts with some interesting effects. For instance as Macbeth dines with Duncan the great silliloquy plotting the assasination is overdubbed It ends a few scenes later giving the impression that the thought has been plaguing Macbeth all night. It also emphasises the aloneness of the tragic figure after his wife's insanity separates him from his own accomplice.

In the end it appears that Polanski chose to do Macbeth more because he liked the story than for the qualitities that have kept it so revered throughout the centuries. He seems to have spent most of his time working on scenes which never happen on stage and there most of all is where he falls into bad taste. These scenes also throw the pace off so that the tragedy actually slows down as it approaches the climax instead of following the quickening pattern that Shakespeare wrote.

The foul and fair theme which starts off the play epitomizes my opinion. There was much gore and unnecessary bad taste in the film which quite offended me; yet there were scenes of such genius as I have never seen in a Shakespearian adaptation. Surely it is a worthwhile film even taking the foul with the fair..

The Great Vizaudo

Cynthia David

It is impossible to watch Brent Titcomb without becoming involved in an unusual artistic performance. Carefree, loose and confident he asked "Is it too relaxed for anybody?" An optimistic person, he laughingly sang, "Tomorrow's going to be fine" by Bob Carpenter.

Most of the evening was spontaneous and unpredictable, involving music, dance and humourous sketches. After fading out one song, he and his partner Tomm Graham attempted The Piano Sequence, a dialogue between the musicians and the spirit hidden inside the piano which was summoned by a roar of Titcomb's conch He also read from his Emergency Only file which included such gems as 'Good News for Vegetarians', informing us that chickens are actually a variety of plant. A set of musical toys including a cowbell and a mousetrap were available for the audience's use to supplement the conga, two tambouras and guitars on stage. The music shifted constantly, from Jamaicae regi to an ancient Greek chant.

A mystical influence, reminiscent of the psychedelic 60's, was prevalent in much of Titcomb's music and dialogue. Seconds of voidness, which occasionally stretched into long minutes, filled the hall Grindt a young dancer, swept cross the room with a fluid grace, oblivious to everything except the music but adding immensely to the show

An interesting facet of Titcomb's style is his use of the voice to express emotion without words. He often experiments with vocal effects in huge, empty silos and ice houses This continual experimentation plays a major role in his music. development which has spanned the past thirteen years and gained him the title The Great Vizaudo, master of visual and audio work

During the intermission, a refreshing change was provided by two students, Kate Jarrett on dulcimer and guitar, and Marilee Jones on guitar. Their crystal clear melodies and soft harmonies led the audience through old lullabies and folk ballads, including the familiar Gypsy Rover and even a bluegrass tune featuring Ms Jarrett on banjo. Ms Jones solo "The Dutchman" a Steve Goodman piece, and an instrumental duet entitled "Presbyterian Guitar" were beautifully done by these very gifted musicians

Chronicles XXX

Make love to me

The Queen's Drama Department is presenting the thirtieth in its Chronicle series this week with a production of two farces by Georges Feydeau, the great French playwright. The production is entitled Make Love to Me.

Our Husband-to-Be and Through the Window, the two short plays which comprise Make Love to Me were written early in Feydeau's career and are somewhat unique because he wrote relatively few one act plays. Yet they contain the same accurate caricature, mad sitiations, and witty dialogue as his late comic masterpiece, A Flea In Her Ear.

Feydeau always begins with a logical premise which, under the pressure of bourgeois pomposity. Such is the case in Make Love to Me. The mad situation in Our Husband-to-Be revolves around two sisters who discover that they love the same man. Through the Window revolves around a fatuous barrister whose lunch is interrupted by a zany young woman seeking an incredible type of revenge on a jealous husband.

In an attempt to capture the tone of high farce, the scripts for Make Love to Me were specially adapted for this production by Professor Patricia Seberman of the French Department. The shows are directed by Professor Bernard Burkom of the Department of Drama, whose productions last season included Comedy Tonight, Medea, and the Thurber Readings. These two short plays are designed by the final year student Anthony Abrams, whose Government Inspector set recently delighted audiences. Through the Window stars Shelley Cavalier and Robert Hanks, and Our Husband-to-Be features Virginia Grieg and Barbara Edwards.

Journal Sports Writers

The Golden Gaels were simply the better team on the weekend. They beat the Laurentian Voyageurs 5-3 and 6-2 Friday night and Saturday afternoon. To accomplish this the Gaels had to battle against a chippy Laurentian team and some pretty crazy refereeing.

Friday night was a case in point. Referee Pat Hegarty called it losely and ended up having to break up two fights in the first period. The feature bout was John Cerre verses Brian Belland. Cerre did everything right, he grabbed Bellands sweater in the proper fashion and established good position. However he forgot to throw any punches and was sent for stitches as well as being ejected from the game. The second bout was a non-event that sent Willie Wing to the dressing for good. These fights were the evidence that the woodchopping on the ice was not being called closely enough.

Despite the display of pugilism the Gaels banged in three goals in the first period to one by Laurentian. Mike Haranis, Doug Grills and Bill VanCamp scored for the Gaels while Dave Chalk answered for the V's.

The Gaels looked like they were going to be hot in the second when Moulton scored at the 50 second mark. However, the Gaels played flatly throughout the second and third periods. Luckily Laurentian wasn't much better. As they remained behind, the Voyageurs got chipper and chipper. Intimidation with the stick became predominant for the rest of the game.

In the third period the Gaels looked tired and they deserved to be. With Cerre and Wing gone and several players hurting the Gaels were reduced to two usable lines. Elmer Debenedet narrowed it to a one point difference at 9:22 and the Gaels settled in to protect their lead which they did efficiently. Hats have to come off to Clyde Harris who held the team in the game in the last ten minutes.

Dougie Grills scored his second of the night with 41 seconds to go when Mike Haramis caught him with a good pass to set him up for a shot at the open net.

Saturday afternoon's game was a little more civilized but not much. Laurentian again used their sticks to attempt to break bones, instead of shooting pucks at Clyde 'the camel' Harris. Once again the referees called an inconsistant game.

Rico Carly and Steve Aubrey gave the Gaels a 2-6 lead in the first. Laurentian managed to tie it up in the second period but when Bill Van Camp scored to make it 3-2 for Queen's Laurentian wasn't to come close again. The Gaels scored three in the third. Bill White got two of those and Doug Grills the other.

The Gaels look like they can go all the way this year. The addition of Grills, Haramis, Harrington and Aubrey has made this a championship calibre team. As well, it is hard to imagine any team having a better goalie and defense than Queen's does presently. If Bill Van Camp, who got two goals and three assists on the weekend, continues to play like he has he can spark the team to unimagined heights.

Coach Bob Carnegie thanks the fans who showed up Friday night. (way to validate, Bob). The Harty arena was just about packed. Such fan support gives the team a great lift and can help psyche out the opposition. Keep it up sports fans and lets see all of you next Friday at 8:00 when the Gaels take on the Western Mustangs.

Wrestling

Z. Scarfarelli
Journal Sports Writer

Queen's Wrestling team saw their first action of the new season this past weekend in a tougher-than-anticipated RCM Open. There was a good deal of quality wrestling on display at this meet, with approximately 85 wrestlers from Ontario and Quebec entered. Queen's rookies, Kevin McAllister, Ron Craddock, Larry Pearson and Tony Traynor had a rough go of it, but showed plenty of promise in their first outing for the Gaels.

Some of the more veteran wrestlers for Queen's also suffered defeat, and will have to work harder in coming weeks to rectify this situation. Queen's picked up one first place finish in the tournament, that by Mike Dwhytie at 167 lbs., as well as third place performances by Alex Faseruk and Larry Duchene.

Next wrestling action is scheduled for Nov. 29 in the tough Ryerson Open, and the young Golden Grapplers will again have their hands full.

Ont. Universities Swimming & Diving

John Ireland
Journal Sports Writer

The Ontario University Relay Swimming and Diving meet has always been a 'class' affair where Queen's has never won a relay event. But this years swimmers and divers posted a number of surprises

Kerry Powells 'flying reverse sommersault' and Fred Kallins two and one-half pike sommersault placed them solidly in fourth place on the three meter board.

The magic number three did not yield at this point, as the first three Queen's swimming relays followed suit by placing third in each of their respecive events The meet opened with the 400 Medley Relay foursome of Fagan, Dennis, Ireland and Pearson. Ireland and Pearson returned in the next event to combine with Leo Hwozdyk and Ken Davie to finish in a time of 3.43.1. The 400 yd Freestyle Relay allowed Dennis just enough time to recover, enabling him to swim his season's best time of 57.2 in the 400 yd Backstroke Relay Following in Dennis' trend Fagan, Serebrin and Davies completed the relay with their best individual performances of the year.

Best performances were not, however, restricted to the swimming end of the pool as rookie diver Rob Laing scored the team's highest marks with his inward dive in the pike position, and veteran diver 'leather-balls' Jim Stoner, returned from the rugged-field to round out coach Freedman's commendable squad.

Clearly the outstanding performance of the meet came in the 400 Butterfly Relay Event. With Irelands laudable opening leg the pressure was on a tired Drew Fagan, who put in a 100 percent effort to move the team from third to just one place back of the easily-favored Toronto University Team in the next lane. Tim Dennis, Queen's outstanding rookie, brought the team further into contention swimming 56.1 The rest of the Queen's team (brought to their feet with excitement) watched as stroke by stroke John Pearson closed the gap and eventually slipped by Toronto's anchor man to finish in an unbelieveable 55.5 and a first place finish.

Furthur mention must be made of a 50 yd. Freestyle by Martin Demmers a 200 yd and 500 yd. swim by Joe Schnitteker and Roger Cassidy in the crescendo relay, as well as, the versatile performance of Alex Muir in his role as 'utility' swimmer.

Queen's hosts York next Friday evening in a dual meet which should continue the fine season experienced by the team this fall.

Sue Higgins and Eleanor Barker jump to block hit from McMaster in Challenge Cup Tournament here over the weekend.

Queen's hosts V-Ball Challenge Cup

Eleanor Barker
Journal Sports Writer

This past weekend, Queen's hosted the largest OWIAA volleyball tournament ever held. In all, fourteen teams were competing for points in the Challenge Cup I.

The preliminary play extended over two full days, with the teams of the Eastern division pitted against those of the West York, Queen's, Western and Waterloo emerged as the top four teams in Ontario.

Queen's first match was against Sir Wilfred Laurier. The gals won the opener handily 15-1, 15-3. Pat Johnson had some amazing offensive plays to lead in this victory The next rival was Windsor, a team with a highly unconventional attack Their short deep sets increased the pace of the game while throwing off Queen's defence by rendering the blockers ineffective. The home team quickly adjusted and took the match in two games straight.

The McMaster game was perhaps Queen's best match Throughout two games the gals maintained top performance with both offense and defense in full gear. As a result, the McMaster team which arrived with their three six-foot-plus players and great intentions, was forced to accept defeat 15-7, 15-6 and fifth place Barb Morrison led in the demoralization with several power line hits.

The first day's play ended with Queen's meeting (its) Waterloo. In an exciting match that could have gone either way, the final score was 15-12, 15-9 in favor of Waterloo. The Queen's players let down a little, something that cannot be done against the consistent black machine

Saturday began with a match against Western. Queen's was in control from the start routing the national champions 15-11 in the first game. Early in the second game, however, Kathy Sproule, one of the first string setters and possibly Queen's best all round player, was injured A somewhat shaken group took the floor and attempted to salvage the game by playing a makeshift 5-1 system. Western won 15-9 Queen's went out in the third game with a new line-up. Barb Morrison making her debut as a setter, and Dorothy Cosgrose as a pseudo-left-hander. Although Queen's was able to continue to play a somewhat recognisable 4-2 system with this adaptation the experienced Western team capitalized on the weak spots and took the match with another 15-9 victory

Dianne Kelly played for Queen's for the first time, in the Ryerson game Demonstrating the results of the desire and dedication she showed in training with most of the Queen's squad all summer, Dianne held her own in the intricate specialist system. She stood out on back court defence and service, as well as sharing the charge of directing the offence with Sue Higgins. As a result, Queen's rallied to beat both Ryerson 15-11, 15-3 and Guelph 10-15, 15-10, 15-7, qualifying for the semifinal

Queen's drew 1st place Waterloo as their opponent After dropping the first game a hard-fought but disappointing 15-13, Queen's succumbed 15-2 to yield the match to Waterloo.

The Challenge Cup I went to Western who beat Waterloo in the finals. Thanks go to Mark Pentland and Bonnie Pronke who staged this large and successful event

Hockey Gals lose first game in 2 yrs.

Flossie:
Journal sports writer

This past Saturday afternoon, the Queen's Ice Hockey Gals who remained undefeated throughout last year's season, suffered an unexpected defeat at the hands of the big McMaster girls from Hamilton. The final score showed Mac on top 4-2.

The majority of the game featured many end-to-end rushes by both sides. Queen's applied a lot of pressure on Mac's defence continually but time and again the numerous shots that were taken just did not come to rest in the net. This is indicated by the fact that Queen's outshot Mac 29-23 over the three periods of play.

The star of the game for Queen's had to be the rookie goaltender, Sue Hall. She came up with many fantastic saves on various two-on-one breaks as well as on several breakaways. Off and on, Queen's forwards and defencemen found themselves caught up in the ice while two or three Mac players broke out of their own end at full speed.

The two teams were so evenly matched that the score going into the third period was tied 1-1. Queen's led the game 1-0 on a tally by Judy Cook (assisted by Carol Petty). The first period and a half proved to be somewhat of an uphill battle for Queen's. Besides having to keep the Mac team in check, Queen's was forced to contend with many questionable penalty calls by the refs. Queen's was assessed 9 minor penalty calls to Macs 5 and twice within the first period, Queen's had two players resting in the penalty box at the same time.

Credit should be given to the penalty killers and especially to Sue Hall who kept the team in the game at this early stage.

The latter half of the second period saw fewer penalty calls and a wide open style of play. Both teams had opportunities to score, but the goalies remained calm and held their ground (or ice).

Queen's came out in the third period ready to capitalize on any opportunities -- but could not fire the puck in the net. As a result of some well executed passes and a breakaway goal, Mac soon found themselves with a comfortable 4-1 lead.

Queen's persisted with fine individual efforts but the completion of offensive plays did not come about as often as it should have. Some line juggling brought out a little more 'oomph' in the aggressiveness of the forwards.

Queen's second and final goal came from Marg Bartlett with assists going to Sue Wright and Janean Gerow.

With about a minute left in the game, Queen's pulled their goalie, but this was to no avail.

Overall, the Queen's Gals played a solid game against a strong Mac Team. The only ingredient lacking at this early point in the hockey season is a little more offensive muscle and hustle. Perhaps this could be achieved through concentration on forechecking by the Queen's forwards.

The next games are this Friday at 5:30 pm at Jock Harty Arena when the opponents will be U of T and then Saturday pm when York visits Queen's.

Queen's Gaels/Gals bow to Laurentian on the courts

Gaels...

Alps Boniwell

It's very hard after a crushing defeat like the 104 to 76 beating the Gaels took at the hands of the Laurentian Voyageurs to put things in their proper perspective. Initial reaction is spew tiracles on pride and humiliation which lends itself to impressive rhetoric but accomplishes nothing positive. The Gaels didn't lose because of lack of desire or effort. They were beaten by execution particularly on offense. Laurentian passed and ran plays as well as anyone Queen's is likely to face all year but viewed objectively they are far less invincible than the Gaels made them out to be.

While Laurentian exhibited the poise and level-headedness that is inherent in a good team Queen's went the opposite route. Instead of countering with a cool and calculating manner on defense, the kind of weaponry needed to defuse the Voyageurs, the Gaels overcompensated by getting too eager and trying too hard. The inevitable result was disorganization and, as Laurentian continued to remain a half step of the Gaels with crisp passing also frustration. The epitome of this was the full-court zone press that the Gaels attempted to stick on Laurentian. It was embarrassingly noticeable in the second half. Down by 11 after 20 minutes, (52-41), Queen's came out looking to quickly narrow the margin. Instead a nightmarish display of press-breaking sewed up the victory for the visitors, leaving Queen's mentally and physically exasperated. To Laurentian's credit it was a neat job of surgery but on the other hand Queen's was a co-operative if unwilling patient.

The first step then on the road back for the Gaels is application of the qualities Laurentian showed on the court to their analysis of the game. Getting upset and discouraged would do more damage than losing the two points on the standings. Believe it or not, Queen's is a good team or more appropriately put, potentially a good team. It will be a measure of how good, if indeed they can pull themselves together after this, the second of two bad defeats.

Foremost in everyone's mind has to be defence. You don't lose basketball games by scoring 76 points, you lose them by giving up 104. It can be argued that Laurentian shot well and they did, but they could have shot just as well with boxing gloves on. They only had to take lay-ups. However if Queen's can shore up their defensive wall the offense will score enough points to get them back on the winning track.

Against the Voyageurs, Derek Swinnard again led Queen's firing 24 points while Andy Boniwell picked up 14. Both Steve McCredy and Dave Dempster played well, McCredy scoring 8, and Dempster pulling down 12 rebounds. But let's talk not of individuals but of the team. Queen's allowed both of Laurentian's big men 23 points apiece and boosted everyone else's average sufficiently to quiet any complaints.

So what's in store for the Gaels? Ottawa plays here one week today; Dec. 2. It's getting repetitive to say the Gaels better start proving themselves. Action speaks louder than words. Let's hope the Gaels action in the future precludes any real need for words.

Gals...

Lyn Atwood
Journal Sports Editor

Friday night, November 21, 1975 the Queen's B-ball women met their arch-foes of last year Laurentian University. Laurentian had no problem in disposing of Queen's and the final score stood at 59-40 for the Voyageurs.

Queen's played their usual man to man offence but seldom got the ball over the half court in the first half of the game. This was heavily felt by the Queen's team -- for statistics show that they lost the game in the first half. In the second half of the game they defeated Laurentian but the points they made up were not enough to overcome the deficit encountered earlier on in the game. The fact that Queen's seemed to by stymied can be attributed to two factors. The first is the very effective double team effort by the Voyageurs. The second is the sad case of 'no hustle' by the Gals. This seems to be killing them game after game. If they could get into fourth gear before the fourth quarter they'd have their games in the bag.

High scorers in this game were Pat Quigley (12) and Kathy Keely (8) of Queen's and Donna Roman (13) of Laurentian.

The shooting percentage for Queen's was about 30 percent -- the trouble is that they weren't shooting enough. Kim Headford pulled down the most rebounds for the Gals.

The next night the Gals faced McMaster University for the first time in league action (due to the rearrangement of league schedules this year). They managed to overcome the Maurauders by three points with a 48-45 score. The Gals played their usual offence and kept switching their defence from man-to-man to triangle to press. They showed evidence of a little more hustle but were still letting Mac give them the run around. Queen's is blessed with an enormous wealth of potential this year in the form of many new rookies. It is hoped that this team will be able to get it together in the future and produce scores with much wider gaps against teams such as McMaster.

The high scorers for Queen's in this game were Sue Gillies (9) Kathy Keet (8), and Pat Quigley (8). Their shooting again was a little more than 30 percent but they were just not taking the amount of shots required to get into the scoring bracket necessary to win the big games. The rebounding during this game was very poor generally speaking with Pat Quigley putting forth the biggest effort on the Gals behalf.

It is becoming very evident in the past few games that the Queen's team is keenly feeling the loss of the many veterans they lost last year. Tall centres such as Pat Patterson and Pat Smith; team men (women) such as Karen Carson and Jean Crichton; quick guards such as Laney Marshall are missed severely. This year is definitely going to be a rebuilding year for the Basketball Gals. The height is there. The strength will come with experience. The experience will come with time.

The Gals will be playing University of Toronto and York University at home this coming weekend so come out and lend them your support.

The automated joy ride of life

It seems unavoidable, really. You might think that it was a deeply ingrained characteristic: that no matter how much wealth we have, we have to waste our time complaining. If we are not moaning about how much work we have, then, because luxuries cost a little more, we are haggling over wages. We hate to wait twenty minutes for a taxi, we toddle off to the doctor with all our sniffles and sneezes, and we cry and stamp our feet, because no one understands our problems.

All things considered, Canadians, and especially students, have the incredible good fortune to live a life so rich that it is beyond the wildest dreams of the vast majority of people in the world. No other civilization has achieved as much: with a chicken in every pot and color televisions in every living room. In the eyes of many people in the world, even the shoddiest houses and the lowest incomes in Kingston represent considerable wealth. For every one Canadian more than ten people receive improper nutrition, and yet we spent our valuable leisure time complaining about eating hamburger for the third time in a week.

Perhaps it is in our nature. Man is an animal that cannot satisfy himself; he continually presses on for new goals. He sees that his present life could still be improved, and so he feels he has a right to grab for more. Considering all that we have, though, our constant complaints can only be a sign of innate greed. If it is our nature to forget our good fortune and demand still more, then we have an explanation for our behavior, but not an excuse.

Unfortunately, because of our endless bickering, we manage to spoil all that we have. Growing up in this middle-class world of plenty, we take our comfort for granted, and when we find ourselves in the smallest bit of trouble, we cry bitterly for help. We demand that the government cure all our minor aches and pains, and we form committees and pass legislation to remove all the hardship from our lives. Instead of finding pleasure, we try to hide from all pain. We voice our petty grievances, forget how to enjoy our protected lives, insisting on an automated joy ride with a minimum of effort.

What right have we to possess all this wealth, to live our lives of comfort and ease, and to squander our existence in shameless squabbles.

Comment: Danno said to write something witty and entertaining for the comment. I lied a little 'cause what he really said was: "pound out some funny shit for the masthead tonight." I really don't know if it is worth it; in the past few weeks the regular readers of the masthead have been driven away by the inconsequential limitations of the comments I once wrote. I don't know if the audience is still out there, besides, I've changed my style of writing and no one else can successfully imitate it. So there you are. But for people like SB & friends I'll try to give the old cerebal kidneys a wee poke and or nudge.

Friday night was the semi-annual Journal Party - lots of booze, beer, and whiskey. John 'the gnome' Morris and several of the smaller gnomes put in an appearance as did several hundred persons who at one time or another played at journalist. A good time was had by all (a single theolog was seen leaving with a young, sweet, pliable member of the opposite sex in tow shame).

It has been decided that I don't fit into any of the traditional slots of the newspaper business. they still haven't come up with a title or phrase that describes my function here - sad but true, perhaps there is a message there somewheres. Reading this over I can see that it has failed to be witty or entertaining, but there you are. Life sometimes resembles a bolted lollipop my children, and what can you do?

Voting official not too official

Dear Editors,

Deciding not to be apathetic students, my room-mate and I went to the Student Union to vote in the recent AMS referendum. We overheard a group of students behind us ask the 'official' behind the ballot box what the referendum was all about. He told them that they could vote as long as they produced their student card.

They decided to vote. Upon reaching question No. 2, they asked the official what it meant, to which he replied, "Oh, the football team just wants some more money, so vote no".

The fact that he was incorrect in his generalization of this issue is irrelevant. Sitting in the "official and impressive position" of punching holes in student cards, his biased opinion is obviously going to influence any uninformed student's vote. Had he been telling students how to vote all day?

Copies of the Journal were readily available, explaining the issues in detail, for anyone who was unsure. He could have directed the inquiring students to one of these, as some of the other officials were doing. We were extremely disappointed in his conduct, and hope it was the exception rather than the rule.

Synopsis: Angus McTavish has been revealed in his identity as a religious hero; that is, he is meek and obedient. We are left wondering how such a loser can possibly save New York and the Whole Free World.

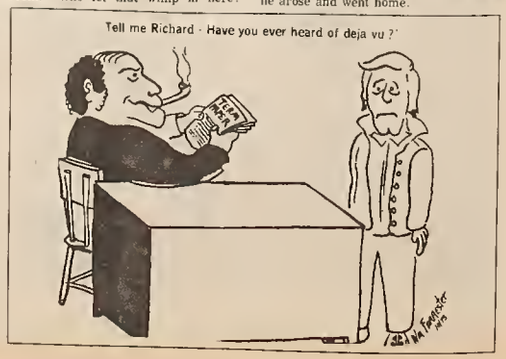
We return to New York. Rockefeller is playing cards, and winning, with Abe Beame. He won because he cheated. "I wonder what they're doing with the pickle-faced little moron that they're holding," he said.

"I don't know, but I sure hope he don't give in. I don't really wanna be turned into sausage meat. I just wish dat jerk Ford would pay up. It would be much easier, ya know, if he just came through. New York might never have to behave itself. We might never lose our jobs." This is what bothered Beame most. 'Firing Firemen don't bother me, but firing bureaucrats does. I'm a bureaucrat, and I don't want to get fired. Why, firing a poor defenceless desk-bound invalid is almost illegal here. It should be illegal.' So went his reasoning. "Stick it out, Angus!" he shouted, enthusiastically. The other men in the room looked at him funny.

At that moment Angus appeared; to the surprise of no one reading this. "I have a dream" said Angus. His voices had returned.

"Hugh?" chorused everyone in the room. "Who let that wimp in here?" muttered Rocky.

"Follow the yellow brick road," said Angus.



"Gibberish", shouted the men.

Angus began walking. "Well begun is half-done" he remarked, by way of explanation. In no time at all he had got all the way to the door. "Seeing is believing" he grinned.

"Little-jerk" they all snickered as he went out the door. Soon he was wandering in the streets. The only person following was Abraham Beame, who had a sort of faith in this little deformed man. Besides, he was desperate.

Suddenly Angus disappeared. He had fallen through a manhole. When Beame reached him he nearly fainted in surprise. He closed his eyes, crossed himself, and opened them again. The vision was still there. Angus was at the bottom except for a large pile of money which almost totally obscured his little green body. He was rolling back and forth in a nearly religious frenzy, which Beame joined as soon as he figured out what had happened.

When it was counted it came to 4.5 billion dollars in small unmarked bills. "I always wondered where all our money went to when I was in charge of it," said Beame. New York was saved and everyone lived happily ever after. Except Angus. He was accused of littering and thrown in jail for three days, after which he arose and went home.

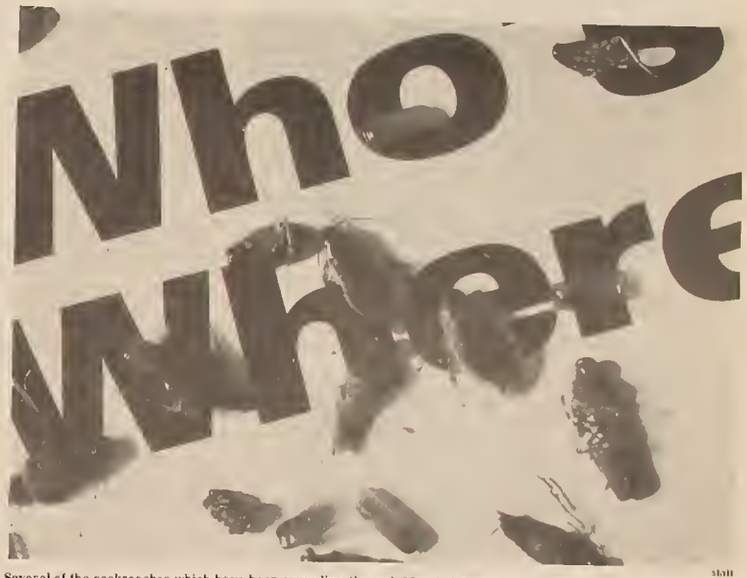
Roaches infest complex

Nancy Bowes

"One tenant has collected one hundred dead cockroaches; he sees ten to twenty live ones per day and has found them in his bed." So said Bruce Millar, Chairman of the Queen's Tenants' Association. Cockroaches have been a problem for the last year in Building No. 3 at 47 Van Order Drive - part of the Queen's Married Students' Housing complex.

After repeated complaints from tenants, Queen's allowed Burton's Sanitation to spray fifteen of the worst infected apartments in September and October of this year.

In October, Queen's renegotiated its contract with Burton's. The price for spraying subsequently took a sizeable jump - to $32 per apartment.



Complaints of infestation by cockroaches started filing in again. This time, the Housing and Property Management Office handed out instructions and Class Four pesticides to be used by the tenants. Millar felt that "this action fulfills the letter of the law", but was careful to add that it "certainly does not conform to the intent or spirit of the law. A landlord or tenant should hold a license to use Class Four pesticides."

Because of the dangers involved in spraying in an area where small children abound, most tenants were not willing to handle the insecticide. City of Kingston By-laws state that all buildings shall be kept free of vermin. The Tenants' Association insisted that just because the people are unwilling to use the pesticide, the University is not released from its obligation to exterminate the insects.

The Housing and Property Management Office promised to send a Ministry of Health Inspector. When Tenants' Association Chairman Millar spoke to the Inspector on Tuesday morning, the official denied that Queen's University ever asked him to inspect any of the premises. Rather, he was asked to advise the University as to their legal obligations in the matter.

Late on Tuesday, the Ministry of Health advised Queen's that its legal basis was very shaky. Queen's has since decided to spray the entire building.

The Tenants' Association is satisfied with this decision. "But, " said Millar, "Queen's students should be informed about the University's reluctance to do something so emminently sensible."

Medicine includes knowledge of history

Barb Nyland

"Total health is much more than the absence of disease and includes factors far beyond the immediate range of medicine." states Dr. Ruth Hodgkinson head of the new Queen's Department of the History of Medical and Related Sciences.

Hodgkinson feels that it is essential for doctors to look beyond their often narrow specialties and consider the effect which social occurences both in the past and the present have on health and disease. Both patients and doctors should be aware that medical discoveries are not miracles but are merely the result of previous work and historical coincidences, says Hodgkinson.

"There is an acceleration now in the medical sciences but it is just a continuation of history. Before the First World War sanitary engineering, and reforms in industry played a greater part in improving the health of western man than important medical discoveries" commented Hodgkinson.

Dr. Hodgkinson, a native of Britain, has been at Queen's since last January. Her department is funded completely by the Hannah Institute for the study of the History of Medical and Related Sciences of Toronto. The Hannah Institute plans to establish four other departments of the history of medicine in Ontario universities but as yet the department at Queen's is the only one in existence.

Dr. Hodgkinson is one of a very small group of intellectuals who specialize in the social history of medicine. Six years ago she founded the Society for the Social History of Medicine. The Society now has members from twenty-one different countries and many different disciplines.

While Hodgkinson feels that she has succeeded in making Britons aware that past social history and present community affairs are extremely important in the practise of medicine she looks upon Canada as a challenge.

"Canadians have largely ignored their own history" she feels. "In Kingston there is a wealth of information about the social history of medicine because of its prisons, hospital services, community health system and military establishments and this has never been investigated."

Hodgkinson plans to start her work on the social history of medicine in Canada from Kingston and then work outward to the rest of the country. She is making her presence felt in the rest of Canada already for she is at the moment a visiting professor at the University of British Columbia.

Liquor skimming to go

Nancy Bowes

In September, the University began skimming 50 percent off the bar profits earned in student-organized events. This action was taken to meet costs involved in improving facilities to comply with LLBO rules.

By the original set-up, the students paid all costs after the University took its share. Because this reduced profits in some cases to almost nil, the University agreed to allow organizers to pay a limited number of constables, janitors and bartenders before taking its 50 percent.

The arrangement was still far from satisfactory. The President of the Commerce Society, Bob Butterill, suggested that the students pay $.50 per year for four years to the University for the improvement of facilities. This recommendation was accepted by the students in the November 19 referendum.

There was still some question late last week, however, whether the University would accept the proposal.

Vice-Principal Kennedy (Administration) quelled all doubt on Monday: "We definitely will revoke the levy." When the fee is to be removed is not yet certain. January 1, 1976 seems to be the favored date.

In addition, the University will refund all money collected by the levy to date. The AMS may expect to receive the rebates before the new year.

AMS President Ian Nordheimer is satisfied with the arrangements proposed by the University this week. He looks forward, however, to arrangements which might allow students to run the events through the AMS rather than through the University administration.

Justice Berger delivers second Corry lecture

by Rob Reynolds

Justice Thomas Berger, Commissioner of the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry, called upon Canadians to ask the question, "Should the character of the North be determined by the South?" as he delivered the second annual Corry Lecture. The annual lecture series was established in 1974 with the intention of exploring the relation between law and politics. This year, as Dean Soberman pointed out in his introduction, the lecture was to focus on a "lively, current, Canadian issue."

Mr. Justice Berger, of the B.C. Supreme Court, was appointed head of the Inquiry on March 21, 1974. He had previously headed the B.C. provincial commission on Family Law Reform. Before being appointed to the bench, Mr. Berger had been leader of the B.C.New Democratic Party, and an M.L.A. for the riding of Vancouver-Burrard. In his speech on Tuesday, Justice Berger justified the role of Royal Commissions and Public Inquiries by citing the Rand Commission, the Rowell-Sirois Commission and others as sharing a "significant influence on public policy in Canada."

He then proceeded to give a brief definition of his role as Commissioner, which is "to see what the social, economic and environmental consequences will be if the pipeline goes ahead and to recommend what terms and conditions should be imposed if the pipeline is built." Berger then identified the companies applying for construction rights to the pipeline; Foothills Pipelines and Canadian Arctic Gas. The competition for the right to build is intense, for as Berger stated, "this pipeline project is the greatest project, in terms of capital expenditure ever undertaken by private enterprise anywhere."

The companies are only one input into the Inquiry because as Berger stated, "Unless you let outsiders in, an Inquiry can become a private, clubby kind of proceeding." Berger pointed out that he has tried to make the proceedings just and open, by making sure that all reports and studies done are available to any party in the dispute. He has also tried to make sure that all interests are represented by introducing funding intervenors. This funding program aids groups who, due to lack of means, would otherwise be unable to have their interests represented. These are needed because as Justice Berger stated about the companies and their relation to the environment, "We should not take their word for it, because they have an interest in seeing that the pipeline is built." In pursuing a just settlement the Inquiry has also funded, through the federal government, citizens' groups, a first for Canada.

A major step to insure that the rights of the native peoples are represented, is the two-level hearing process. The formal hearings which take place at Yellowknife, are meant to resemble a courtroom trial. At Yellowknife, the scientists, the engineers, the biologists, the anthropologists and the economists are questioned and cross-examined. Berger, however, put more emphasis on the Community hearings where, as he put it, "people living in the communities are given the opportunity to speak in their own language and in their own way." Berger said he heard from 500 witnesses in English, Loucheux, Slavey, Dogrib, Chipewyan and Eskimo. As Berger said of these people, "Their thoughts aren't filtered through a screen of jargon. They are talking about their innermost concerns, their innermost fears."

Eventually, Berger dispensed with discussing the legal structure of the Inquiry and discussed the issues.

Berger stated that "We look upon the North as our last frontier.". The essential distinction being that the North is our frontier, but it is the natives' homeland. Berger also expounded upon the question of the right of the South to use the North's resources, and questioned their right to consume a disproportionate amount of the world's resources. Justice Berger eloquently described the situation by asking "How much energy does it take to run the industrial machine, where does the energy come from, where is the machine going, and what happens to the people who live in the path of the machine?"

As Berger noted, "the contest has begun", but as to who will win he offered little insight. Berger did concede that, "maybe it is time the metropolis realized it has something to learn from Old Crow and Hay River."

The sad realization is that the federal government can choose to ignore Berger's recommendations when his report is handed down. If the federal government allows construction, then the work of the Commission in establishing a just settlement could ultimately count for naught.

Student wins Rhodes scholarship

David Colburn

Early this week Doug Hutchinson, a fourth year philosophy student, became the first Queen's student since 1968 to be awarded a Rhodes Scholarship.

There are 11 Rhodes Scholarships awarded in Canada each year: two for Ontario and Quebec, and one for all the rest except for P.E.I. which must share Nova Scotia's. Hutchinson's scholarship was received through the British Columbia Rhodes Committee.

The award is tenable for two years with a renewable third year available. Each Rhodes Scholar receives approximately $4500 a year to cover the tuition and living expenses at Oxford University.

Doug Hutchinson Rhodes recipient.

Hutchinson hopes to be able to study for a B. Phil. degree at Oxford. The course of study for this degree extends over two years. One further year of study would lead to a D.Phil. degree.

Hutchinson's next problem is getting accepted by one of the colleges at Oxford as well as by his faculty. It is possible to be accepted by a college and not into a particular faculty or vice versa. If he is unable to join the graduate school he plans to attend the undergraduate programme in honours philosophy.

Several obstacles presented themselves during his quest for the honour. The largest of which was the mail strike. Hutchinson's original application never was received by the Selection committee. Through the efforts of Mr. Ellis, Assistant Registrar Student Awards, Doug was able to have his application considered.

Another problem was presented when he was informed just a week in advance that his interview was to be held at U.B.C.'s Faculty Club. Needless to say he wasted no time in flying out West.

The interview conducted last Saturday morning, lasted about 45 minutes. The panel consisting of the Chief Justice of British Columbia and six former Rhodes Scholars, fired a variety of questions at Doug: from the relationship between Aristotle and Galileo to where do you see yourself in five years? Later the same day the panel made their decision and informed the applicants. Hutchinson was unable to attend this portion of the process and the committee did not have his phone number. It was not until the next day when he phoned a member of the selection committee that he learnt that he had been awarded the Rhodes Scholarship.

Today, both of Kingston's full time radio stations were awarded the Nobel Prize for Good Taste in Broadcasting. "It was felt that their unswerving dedication to the top 40 deserved some sort of recognition. Nowhere else in the world is this feature so prominant as it is in Kingston."

The other factor which influenced the decision was the manner in which the stations respect their audiences. "Their games are obvisously geared toward intelligent, mature listeners."

The committee closed by asserting that "These two stations are so evenly matched that it was impossible to award either one the award singly. They have each done more for the advancement of mankind than all of Previous History.

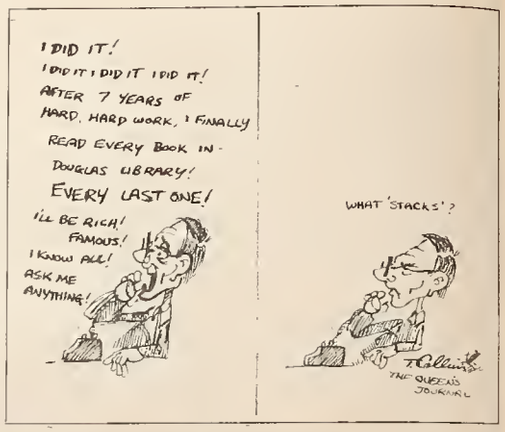
Housing survey needs student help

Nancy Bowes

The Campus Planning Office is sending out its sixth annual survey of off-campus housing trends this week.

800 questionnaires will be sent to Queen's students living off-campus to determine needs for housing. Mr. Eric Thrift of the Campus Planning Office said that the "information shows trends and changes in off-campus housing, costs, types of accommodation and location preferences."



The results of the eight-page survey will be tabulated and compared to results from previous years. The Sub-Committee on Student Residences Planning will produce a mimeographed report detailing the housing trends.

Past surveys have resulted in the present plans for Queen's Five, student housing in the block bounded by Union St., University Ave., Earl St. and Alfred St. The idea of the project is to retain the serviceable university-owned houses and to create some newer apartments where needed. By no means would the block be demolished. The plans reveal a successful attempt to "retain the character of the block," said Mr. Thrift.

Queen's Five is still in the planning stages because financing for the venture is uncertain.

Students who receive a questionnaire are asked to take a few minutes to fill it out and return it without delay.

Due to postal problems, the questionnaires should be placed in the Campus Mail system, via any University Department or the Queen's Post Office

Faith and reality

Bruce Raddatz

Dr. C.P.Taylor, a respected biophysicist from University of Western Ontario, is speaking on campus this week as part of the "Invitation to Live" crusade. His theme is "the essential relationship between faith and objective reality." He will be expanding this in different areas of interest at the five talks he is giving.

Dr. Taylor's achievements include a Rhodes Scholarship and several published papers, ranging from models of muscle action to studies on Cytochrome C. He became a follower of Christ while an undergraduate at Oxford.

He is giving a Biology Department seminar today at 3:30 on "Creationism, Evolutionism, and mere Christianity". A probable sub-topic will be his concern about the largely-unfulfilled obligation teachers of science have to show their students the limits of science and the scientific method.

At 8 p.m. tonight he speaks on "the place of the intellect in the Christian life". Dr. Taylor says he feels a lot of Christians shortchange themselves intellectually, and so suffer both in faith and action. "A proper respect for the intellect is essential for understanding the Bible and obligations to the world we inhabit" but he views the secret of being truly human as lying in accepting total dependence on God.

A happier Christmas

In an attempt to help give a happier Christmas to an underpriviledged child or family this year, the Adelaide-Ban Righ Block has left the space under their Christmas tree reserved for these people. They are asking students, faculty, and staff members to leave a gift under the tree in the 'Ban Righ Fireside Room' anytime between Friday November 28th and Friday December 5th.

A spokesman for the group, Jodi Button, is requesting any toys, games, or books be left. Something as small as hair ribbons for a little girl or a colouring book and crayons for a young child would be appreciated. The only prerequisite for gifts is that they be new - it would be a shame for a child to be presented with a used toy on Christmas morning. As well as, or instead of toys, packaged and tinned food goods would also help. These gifts need not be wrapped, as the Salvation Army Welfare Department takes care of wrapping and distributing the presents.

All members of the Queen's community are asked to contribute in order to make this event a successful one (it would take very little time, and the location is easily accessible to everyone on campus). Just keep in mind the tremendous pleasure a child would have in finding that he had indeed been remembered on Christmas morning

Campus Bookstore and the story on books

John Bottomley

Responsibility for the high prices on some books at Campus Bookstore lies with the distributors who supply the books, according to the Bookstore's manager Frank Gauchie.

He also said that the reason most books show a slight markup over the price printed on the cover is that the books are originally marked in American prices, rather than Canadian.

The problem with multiple stickers on books should soon be over, because, according to Gauchie, legislation which would prevent the practice is in its final stages. This legislation will do two things. First, Gauchie said, "it will allow distributors only three months to sell all their re-priced books," and after that, books would have to be sold at whatever they are pre-priced at.

The second half of the legislation prevents distributors from sending one part of a shipment at one price, and a subsequent part of the same shipment at a mark-up. Until now, the student has not been affected by this practice, as the Bookstore "absorbed the loss' Gauchie emphasized.

One method which Gauchie has used to avoid distributors is to buy books through a professor who can order direct from the manufacturer. He cited an example of one specific text which cost students $12.00 last year and which is now selling for $25.00 because he couldn't go through a professor.

Gauchie claimed that the Bookstore generally took a loss on its textbooks and that the sale of tee-shirts and sweaters helped to "keep our head above water." Even so, he said, their prices are lower than downtown: "In some cases we run $ .75 to $1.25 lower than downtown for a comparable tee-shirt."

In spite of this, these services (sweaters etc.) are only steeked if students want them: according to Gauchie, "We must have three requests before we stock an item.

Students get loan run-around

WINNIPEG (CUP) --- Student representatives are not needed on the two bodies that hash out most of the federal student aid policy, according to Manitoba Minister of Colleges and Universities Ben Hanuschak.

Students should not sit on the Canada Student Loans Plenary Group or on the Council of Ministers of Education because these are not federal but "inter-provincial bodies".

If students want to have input into the rules and regulations covering student loans they should either "work through the provincial department responsible for student aid" or talk "directly to the federal minister responsible for administering the Canada Student Loans Act."

The National Union of Students has been campaigning vigorously for the past year for student representation on student aid decision-making bodies at the federal level, but with no success.

According to NUS executive secretary Dan O'Connor, the reasons given by Hanuschak for excluding students is "the same tired line we've been getting for the past year."

"The federal-provincial game plan on this issue has become increasingly clear. The provinces say we should stay off the decision-making bodies because they are 'inter-provincial' rather than 'federal' which just avoids answering the question."

"Or they say we should talk to the federal government, knowing full well the federal government takes the position that we should talk to the provinces."

Guilty parties get theirs

SAN FRANCISCO (ZNS—CUP) — One of the more illuminating quotes of the week comes from Attorney F. Lee Bailey, one of the lawyers who was defending Patty Hearst.

Bailey says: "My clients want freedom, not justice. I get paid for seeing that my clients have every break the law allows. I have knowingly defended a number of guilty men. But the guilty never eseape unscathed. My fees are sufficient punishment for anyone."

Copeland's church mouse

Brian Copeland

Principal Watts, affectionately known as Rono MacDono, (of over 6 million served fame), has been Queen's 15th Principal for just over a year now, and one political pundit described him as good but not great. From all reports, he has been running the Senate and the Board of Trustees with an iron hand, and a velvet glove, in a style that Dr. Deutsch well established when he was Principal.

Notably, concerning his first year in office, Principal Watts has never seemed to miss a chance to call the Ontario government into check. We applaud his efforts, and urge him to keep up the good fight.

Another anniversary is that of our Rector, Bruce Trotter, the third student to hold that position. He has been in office for a year now, and as was expected, he is doing an outstanding job. That is not said lightly, for Bruce has a rare dedication to this university, and in particular to the students. When he retires next fall, we strongly urge the Senate to award him an honorary degree in recognition for his service. It would be well deserved

xxxx

If Flora MacDonald becomes Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, and Prime Minister as well, I trust Queen's will once again be playing a major role in the policy-making process of the federal government. Flora still has strong ties with the Department of Political Studies, and has a number of Queen's students and ex-Queen's students working on her leadership campaign, including Marvin Bloos.

Miss MacDonald is the current front runner in the Conservative leadership race, but an announcement from Peter Lougheed of Alberta could change that situation.

The Padre, A M Laverty, is not, that I know of, celebrating any anniversaries, but he is always newsworthy. A sign of our times is that the Padre used to be the secondary school liaison officer, chief fund raiser, and university chaplain for Queen's. With the growth of Queen's, massive bureaucracies have taken over, for the most part, his role with the secondary schools and his fund raising although he still has an active interest in both areas. The Padre has played an integral role in the development of this university, and his particular Christian philosophy has left an indelible mark on Queen's and its students, past and present. He has a joy about life, and an excitement about the prospects for tomorrow. Thanks, Padre!

The first announced candidate for the upcoming AMS Executive Elections is Gerald Lewarne, a third year Economics major. Mr. Lewarne says that he is a candidate because "the AMS is not doing what it should be."

Beyond books, exams, papers & mail strike

Gerry Lewarne, Rob Reynolds

It looks very good for an end in the postal strike. The union has said that it wishes to go back to the negotiating table with trimmed down demands. Postmaster General Bryce Maekasey has said many times over the past week that he will not go beyond his offer of 38 percent inerease over 30 months. Mr. Maekasey has been supported (in a manner of speaking) by many members of SUPW. Another 600 workers have returned to work and there are now close to 300 full and part-time workers in Terminal A in Toronto, whieh handles 75 percent of the country's mail.

Food price review

Many major food merchandising firms have frozen priees on all non-perishable goods. The freeze does not inelude meat fresh fruit. Dominion Stores, Loblaws, IGA, Food City, A&P, and Steinberg's have all announeed this freeze to keep up with competition. The freezes last for about 60 days in all cases. However the president of Sunnybrook Food Markets, Julie Goodbaum, has said that the freeze is a "sham" because all the goods affected by the freeze will vary only a penny or two in the 60 day period.

Man strikes UFO

Travis Walton, the man who was blasted by a blue ray emanating from a UFO, is back in Snowflake, Arizona. Walton told CBC's AS IT HAPPENS that he does not remember being blasted but he did wake up later and says he saw human-like creatures who were hairless. When he awoke, he started to struggle because he was in a great deal of pain and very afraid. However, he says he was only awake about two or three hours out of the five and a half days that he was missing. He does not know if he was fed during that time but there is a cut in his arm that indicates he was fed intravenously. He lost about twelve pounds during the period. Scientists studying him have found nothing which indicates he has been deluded or is lying

One interesting theory has surfaced in the last two weeks concerning UFOS. One American expert has said that UFOs may really be unmanned reconnaisanee planes. This would aecount for their ability to turn and swoop so suddenly because the drastie changes in direction would erush any occupants in the craft through centrifigal force.

Degrees a myth

WATERLOO (CUP) — The benefits of higher education may have been oversold in the 1960's but there is still need for university and college degrees for certain jobs, University of Waterloo President Burt Matthews said November 27.

Matthews was commenting on a statement made recently by Dr. Harry Parrot the new Minister Of Colleges and Universities, who said the belief that degrees ean ensure recipients good jobs is "a myth".

Parrot, taking part in an all-day faculty development workshop at Conestoga College said he intends to repeat that view thousands of times, if necessary, to get rid of a false impression that has been promoted by high schools, employers, colleges and universities.

The pieces of paper offered by universities and colleges are of no greater or lesser value than satisfactory work experience, the Woodstock dentist said.

"The myth is there...it'll get worse if I don't challenge it."

Parrot feels that because he has a doctorate, the first to hold one in his portfolio, he can afford to make the statement about "the myth" with credibility

Matthews said that while getting a degree doesn't neeessarily land the student a good job, for eertain oceupations a degree is required. "There is no doubt about it...higher edueation is required for some occupations."

"If one wants to become an engineer then one should persue a university degree rather than a community college one."

However, for some people the persuit of a degree isn't the best "route" to follow since they might find fulfilment in other types of edueation, he cautioned.

Dirty tricks at exam time

Dear Editors:

Exam time is coming again and like most students I'm getting a little jittery. Unfortunately what causes my nervousness is not only the realization of my own intellectual poverty, but also the fear that the exams I will faee may be less than fair.

I have written a total of nine final examinations in physies. With about 45 minutes left in one of these, proctors scurried up and down the aisles making a major change to one of the questions. Two exams contained misleading mistakes that were never eorreeted. One exam had ten typing errors. Another exam paper didn't give values for the required physical constants. Still another exam had a question with data whieh indicated that the top of the earth's ionosphere was well beyond the moon! And, of eourse, many of the exams were liberally sprinkled with ambiguities that make examinations exercises in mind reading.

While all these were exeellent attempts to upset the students writing the exams, my favourite example of 'dirty tricks' occurred during a mid-year exam in a physies course. We were given an exam paper of titanic length by our professor who also aeted as proetor. We were not given any instructions about the time allotted, and so we naturally assumed it would be three hours. However, our prof became rather bored with the proceedings and, without warning, ended the exam with a smart-alec comment, after an hour and fifty minutes. While this episode is probably unique it is the logical culmination of the philosophy on which this university is run. The right of one brilliant and erudite professor to a warm cup of coffee clearly overrides the right of 22 swines to write a fair exam (the fact that the swines are paying the brilliant professor's salary is, of course, irrelevant).

It is this philosophy which makes me wonder if I, or anyone else, will get a fair deal this year.

Perchance too verbose

Dear Editors:

I would just like to extend my thanks to Trishe Crowe for writing the very illuminating letter on verbosity which appeared under the title 'Something about Nothing', in Tuesday's Journal. It makes articles like 'The automated joy ride of life', and 'Can you see past your nose' almost understandable.

Library bus unused service

Dear Editors:

With budgets being cut back everywhere on campus, Queen's people are going to have to start making more efficient use of the facilities and services which do exist.

When budget reductions necessitated the closing of Douglas Library at 11:00pm on weeknights, there were a great number of complaints. Fortunately, for all of us who favour or require the use of campus facilities for study, the library hours were extended to midnight from Monday to Thursday. The sad thing is that this was not made use of by students to nearly the degree that one might have thought judging from the initial outery. One of the reasons that the majority of students still leave the library (and other eampus functions) at 11 o'clock is because that is the time of the last run of the Portsmouth bus going towards West Campus and St. Lawrence College.

What very few students know is that Queen's University has chartered a bus (of the dial-a-bus variety which means niee seats and well heated) to run to West Campus for the late hours of the night from Monday to Saturday. The bus leaves from the bus shelter on the corner of University and Union on the hour and half hour beginning at 11:30 and making the last run at 1 a.m. The bus leaves West Campus to return at a quarter to and a quarter after the hour. It is not neeessary to show your student eard (or pay) for this serviee and you can get let on or off anywhere along the way between the two eampuses.

We as Queen's students are in effect paying for this service when we lay out all those hard earned dollars in September, and this is just another case of students not being properly informed about where those dollars are going. The faet is that this serviee has been so poorly advertised, that the majority of the small number of students who actually make use of this bus, have discovered it by ehance.

Now that exam time is so close, students are going to be forced to spend longer - and later - hours on campus with the books. This is the time when a badly done job of advertising this service can be at least partially rectified. At the present volume of students using this service it is not worth the money that is being spent on it. So let's see some decent, understandable and noticeable mention of this shuttle bus, that we all are paying for, made in the Journal. Obviously the tiny blurb printed practically in the fold of the page sometime back in September was not adequate.

Check your flying facts

Dear Editors:

Dave Raymond's article "Get home cheaply, learn to fly now" is scriously lacking in a realistic perspective on the topic of learning to fly. The theme suggests that it is as easy to get one's 'wings' as it is to get a car license, an attitude which is naive and unappreciative of the standards of training and levels of proficiency required by Canadian flight training schools. Consider the fact that when a licensed pilot flys a 4-seater single engine aircraft, he is responsible for (let alone the well-being of his passengers) a vehicle at a minimum new replaeement value of about $17,000, compounded by at least $250,000 in additional damage insurance. The pilot has to be good and his training, has to have been rigorous. The 3 hour written component of the Canadian Private Pilot exam, administered by the Ministry of Transport for the 73-74 year, indicated a greater than 50 percent failure rate for those students taking the exam for the first time.

Often also, "the choice between a private (Dave refers to it as an operator's) and a commercial license" involves much more than merely making the decision of which would be more suitable to your future goals. Financially this involves about a $3,000 difference (115 hours in a 2 place single engine, 10 hours instrument), and a minimum of one year's intensive training; flying when weather conditions permit, aireraft and instruetors are available, and schoolwork and family commitments don't conflict. Moreover, his suggestion that a commereial pilot's license "practically assures you of a job", in this era of drastic fuel restraint and rising inflation, "where a university education does not." I find even more diffieult to swallow. One has only to inquire with a major airline as to the extent of their employment-waiting-list of A.T.R. pilots (in the U.S. most of them previously trained to fly in Vietnam), to realize that there are eurrently more airline-calibre pilots on the ground than in the air.

Finally, as Dave's article is directed primarily towards a university population, it should be pointed out that government allowances for flight training (i.e. tax deductions) generally are minimal. Most college students don't pay income tax on summer earnings, and therefore are not eligible.

I am a private pilot with 200 hours pilot-in-command time, and have flown most small aircraft. I have great respect for those pilots who are learning to fly, those who have soloed, and those who have obtained higher-level ratings. In the cockpit they are often exaeting individuals, who rarely toss around such flippant comments as, "Come fly with me". Fortunately, comments of this nature are reserved for stewardesses and airline hostesses.

P.S. Dave, do you fly?

Harry Heimbecker

Short note to explain

Dear Editors:

Perhaps just a short note is in order to explain the new column idea which the AMS is running on the advertising page each Tuesday. An idea originating within Inner Council, the column, entitled "Profile", is to present a general outline of various important roles which are fulfilled on campus by students from Queen's. The idea here is to describe their activities so that the student body might become better acquainted with both the responsibilities that different jobs entail, and those people who often receive little recognition, but yet put forward a great amount of work on the student's behalf. So that these people might be more easily recognized, we hope to be able to submit a picture of them along with the article, as well, thereby drawing more attention to the AMS page in making its purpose doublefold, by not only informing students of upeoming events, but by increasing their understanding of various functions within the AMS, as well

Free money & freeloaders

Dear Editors:

I am in full agreement with the reduction of the maximum grant and the raising of the loan portion. As it now stands an individual receiving the maximum would be getting $12,800 over 4 years and would only have to repay $3,200 of this. This means if a student spends $3,200 each university year, he is receiving a 4 year education for the price of one year. I realize very few people do receive the maximum but numerous do obtain some grant. My complaint rests here!

These people are receiving the full benefits of a university education for less than those who ean get just loan or no loan due to their personal or parental income. If these people really do want an education, let them pay the full price. All graduates receive equal opportunities in the job market so that finanees during university are irrelevant in determination of future salaries.

A person is in a much better position to pay for their education onee finished and working full time as ample interest free or low interest opportunities are available for repayment. In my opinion these people receiving grants should be satisfied with loans and not demand a partially free education from the government. Let's have parity in costs among those taking university whether through parental or personal payment. There are enough government "free loaders" that we do not have to add to the problem by expecting "free" money just for being at university

This year's publicaton of "Who's Where" displays a picture and fairly detailed write up of all the members of the administration, except the Vice-Principal (Administration) R. J. Kennedy. His responsibilities include considerably more than "personnel and staffing" (eg purchasing and food services, university services, housing and property management the Donald Gordon Centre, physical plant, campus planning). Beyond this, however, it does seem strange that Who's Where couldn't come up with a picture of someone who has worked at Queen's for thirty years.

Note from Who's Where Editor: There was no picture of Vice-principal Kennedy because neither the News Dept., Alumni, nor the Queen's Journal had one

An apology

Dear Editors:

I should like to apologize to Lauren Gallagher for the improper conduct of one of the polling station clerks I specifically made sure that there were Journals at each polling station and asked that the clerks refer to them if any voter was unclear on the issues. Accidents are bound to happen, and I'd hoped that Queen's students would be able to make up their own minds on the issues.

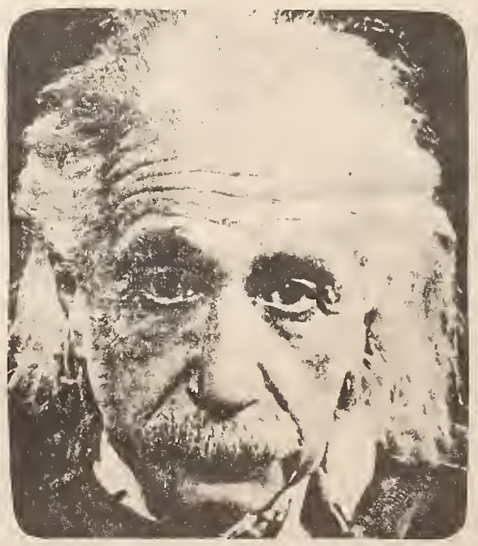
Einstein on Socialism

Albert Einstein, the formulator of the theory of relativity, has also expressed favoritism for a socialist society. The following article originally appeared in May, 1949, as an introduction to the first issue of the independent socialist magazine, Monthly Review. Although now 26 years old, the essay has applications to the present world situation.

By Albert Einstein
adapted from the martlet, victoria

Is it advisable for one who is not an expert on economic and social issues to express views on the subject of socialism? I believe for a number of reasons that it is.



Let us first consider the question from the point of view of scientific knowledge. It might appear that there are no essential methodological differences between astronomy and economics: scientists in both fields attempt to discover laws of general acceptability for a circumscribed group of phenomena in order to make the interconnection of these phenomena as clearly understandable as possible. But in reality such methodological differences do exist. The discovery of general laws in the field of economics is made difficult by the circumstance that observed economic phenomena are often affected by many factors which are very hard to evaluate separately. In addition, the experience which has accumulated since the beginning of the so-called civilized period of human history has - as is well known - been largely influenced and limited by causes which are by no means exclusively economic in nature. For example, most of the major states of history owed their existence to conquest. The conquering peoples established themselves, legally and economically, as the privileged class of the conquered country. They seized for themselves a monopoly of the land ownership and appointed a priesthood from among their own ranks. The priests, in control of education, made the class division of society into a permanent institution and created a system of values by which the people were henceforth, to a large extent unconsciously, guided in their social behavior.

But historic tradition is, so to speak, of yesterday; nowhere have we really overcome what Thorstein Veblen called "the predatory phase" of human development. The observable economic facts belong to that phase and even such laws as we can derive from them are not applicable to other phases. Since the real purpose of socialism is precisely to overcome and advance beyond the predatory phase of human development, economic science in its present state can throw little light on the socialist society of the future.

Second, socialism is directed towards a social-ethical end. Science, however, cannot create ends and, even less, instill them in human beings; science, at most, can supply the means by which to attain certain ends. But the ends themselves are conceived by personalities with lofty ethical ideals and - if these ends are not stillborn, but vital and vigorous - are adopted and carried forward by those many human beings who, half unconsciously, determine the slow evolution of society.

For these reasons, we should be on our guard not to overestimate science and scientific methods when it is a question of human problems; and we should not assume that experts are the only ones who have a right to express themselves on questions affecting the organization of society.

If we ask ourselves how the structure of society and the cultural attitude of man should be changed in order to make human life as satisfying as possible, we should constantly be conscious of the fact that there are certain conditions which we are unable to modify. As mentioned before, the biological nature of man is, for all practical purposes, not subject to change. Furthermore, technological and demographic developments of the last few centuries have created conditions which are here to stay. In relatively densely settled populations with the goods which are indispensable to their continued existence, an extreme division of labor and a highly-centralized productive apparatus are absolutely necessary. The time - which, looking back, seems so idyllic - is gone forever when individuals or relatively small groups could be completely self-sufficient. It is only a slight exaggeration to say that mankind constitutes even now a planetary community of production and consumption.

I have now reached the point where I may indicate briefly what to me constitutes the essence of the crisis of our time. It concerns the relationship of the individual to society. The individual has become more conscious than ever of his dependence upon society. But he does not experience this dependence as a positive asset, as an organic tie, as a protective force, but rather as a threat to his natural rights, or even to his economic existence. Moreover, his position in society is such that the egotistical drives of his make-up are constantly being accentuated, while his social drives, which are by nature weaker, progressively deteriorate. All human beings, whatever their position in society, are suffering from this process of deterioration. Unknowingly prisoners of their own egotism, they feel insecure, lonely, and deprived of the naive, simple, and unsophisticated enjoyment of life. Man can find meaning in life, short and perilous as it is, only through devoting himself to society.

The economic anarchy of capitalist society as it exists today is, in my opinion, the real source of the evil. We see before us a huge community of producers the members of which are unceasingly striving to deprive each other of the fruits of their collective labor - not by force, but on the whole in faithful compliance with legally established rules. In this respect, the entire productive capacity that is needed for producing consumer goods as well as additional capital goods - may legally be, and for the most part are, the private property of individuals.

Private capital tends to become concentrated in few hands, partly because of competition among the capitalists, and partly because technological development and the increasing division of labor encourage the formation of larger units of production at the expense of the smaller ones. The result of these developments is an oligarchy of private capital the enormous power of which cannot be effectively checked even by a democratically organized political society. This is true since the members of legislative bodies are selected by political parties, largely financed or otherwise influenced by private capitalists who, for all practical purposes, separate the electorate from the legislature. The consequence is that the representatives of the people do not in fact sufficiently protect the interests of the underprivileged sections of the population. Moreover, under existing conditions, private capitalists inevitably control, directly or indirectly, the main sources of information (press, radio, education). It is thus extremely difficult, and indeed in most cases quite impossible, for the individual citizen to come to objective conclusions and to make intelligent use of his political rights.

The situation prevailing in an economy based on the private ownership of capital is thus characterized by two main principles: first, means of production (capital) are privately owned and the owners dispose of them as they see fit. second, there is no such thing as a pure capitalist society in this sense. In particular, it should be noted that the workers, through long and bitter political struggles, have succeeded in securing a somewhat improved form of the "free labor contract" for certain categories of workers. But taken as a whole, the present day economy does not differ much from "pure" capitalism.

Production is carried on for profit, not for use. There is no provision that all those able and willing to work will always be in a position to find employment; an "army of unemployed" almost always exists. The worker is constantly in fear of losing his job. Since unemployed and poorly paid workers do not provide a profitable market, the production of consumers' goods is restricted, and great hardship is the consequence. Technological progress frequently results in more unemployment rather than in an easing of the burden of work for all. The profit motive, in conjunction with competition among capitalists, is responsible for an instability in the accumulation and utilization of capital which leads to increasingly severe depressions. Unlimited competition leads to a huge waste of labor, and to that crippling of the social consciousness of individuals which I mentioned before.

Crippling of individuals

This crippling of individuals I consider the worst evil of capitalism. Our whole educational system suffers from this evil. An exaggerated competitive attitude is inculcated into the student, who is trained to worship acquisitive success as a preparation for his future career.

I am convinced there is only one way to eliminate these grave evils, namely through the establishment of a socialist economy, accompanied by an educational system which would be oriented toward social goals. In such an economy, the means of production are owned by society itself and are utilized in a planned fashion. A planned economy, which adjusts production to the needs of the community, would distribute the work to be done among all those able to work and would guarantee a livelihood to every man, woman, and child. The education of the individual, in addition to promoting his own innate abilities, would attempt to develop in him a sense of responsibility for his fellow men in place of the glorification of power and success in our present society.

Nevertheless, it is necessary to remember that a planned economy is not yet socialism. A planned economy as such may be accompanied by the complete enslavement of the individual. The achievement of socialism requires the solution of some extremely difficult socio-political problems: how is it possible, in view of the far-reaching centralization of political and economic power, to prevent bureaucracy from becoming all-powerful and overweening? How can the rights of the individual be protected and therewith a democratic counterweight to the power of bureaucracy be assured?

Science versus ethics

By Barbara Chasin
and Richard Frank reprinted from Science for the Penple
adapted from the chevron, waterloo

Does an increase in scientific and technological knowledge have to result in the destruction of human lives and seemingly irreparable damage to the environment? The answer given by many seems to be "yes". We seem to be faced with the dilemna of having but two unpalatable alternatives: either dismantle modern technology or face a likely doomsday.

But is this dilemma real? In this brief essay we wish to show that the dilemma in question is not caused by anything in the nature of technology. Rather it is the politics of those who control science which creates the dilemma.

Liberals assume that once science has progressed so that we know how to achieve a given result technically, the problem then becomes one of convincing policy-makers that the solution should be put into operation. In recent years the ecological threat has challenged these liberal notions in two ways. First of all policy-makers seem often to ignore the solutions offered by scientists, as when the government continued to use chemical agents in Vietnam long after there was overwhelming evidence that these chemicals would cause long-term, perhaps irreparable damage to the environment. Secondly, even when policy-makers do agree with the scientists, corporations seem to have an endless capacity to resist the decision when losses of profits are involved. Liberals, however, because their view of society is basically one of accepting the structure of power and privilege, seem to construe the problem as one of the "dangers of technology" and its effects.

Marxists, on the other hand, take a completely different approach. They start from the premise that modern capitalist societies contain two essential classes: owners of the means of production who run their businesses primarily to make a profit, and workers who sell their labor in order just to make a living. According to the Marxist view, the ethical implications of the uses of new scientific knowledge can only be judged according to which of these two classes will primarily benefit from it.

In Marxist theory, there is no way to resolve the conflict between the two classes except by a seizure of political control of the entire society by the workers - who represent the overwhelming majority of the people - leading eventually to a society without classes altogether. Once the working class holds political power, the apparent science-ethics dilemma will tend to disappear, for any discovery which would harm the majority of people could not be put to use simply because it would bring profits to the few. In this society, science would come under the democratic control of all the people.

A corollary of this conclusion is that until capitalism is overthrown, scientists must always choose whether they are working for the capitalist class or the working class. Liberal scientists, who think they work for "science" in reality end up working most of the time for the class which holds power - that is, the capitalists. To illustrate how these different approaches work out in a concrete case, let us take a look at one of the ecology movement's major concerns - overpopulation.

A liberal dilemma — what to do about overpopulation

Probably the most painful dilemma facing liberal ecologists today is "overpopulation." With global famine on the horizon, with world resources apparently being stretched to their outer limits, people keep producing children at rates that threaten to push population far beyond the capacity of the earth to support it. And liberals ask, "what is it that has brought on this problem? Was it not the rising standard of living which came about as a result of the technological advances of the industrial revolution? Was it not the outcome of the discoveries of medicine which allowed for a lowering of the death rate while bringing no accompanying reductions in the birth rate?" In short, the population problem appears to them to be the direct if unintended result of the advance of scientific knowledge.

In the face of this crisis liberals have tried to develop solutions. In the 1950's moderate attempts were made to induce "birth control" by appealing to people's "better instincts". These programs, the experts agree, have failed. Confronted thus, with the apparent fact that people, particularly in the poor countries of the world, will not voluntarily reduce their birth rate, increasingly stringent measures have begun to be considered. American foreign aid is now often made contingent upon acceptance by the receiver-nation of a certain dose of birth-control technology. Family-planning schemes for poor nations are peddled by scientists working for foundations or government agencies. Paul Ehrlich, the veritable dean of the ecology scientists, has recently written the starkest statement yet. Looking at 30 years of failure to make significant reductions in population growth in India, he advises that "India's government may well have to resort to some coercive method sooner or later, unless famine, war, or disease take the problem out of its hands." Some scientists, apparently concerned with the failure of their programs to check rapid population growth, now find themselves compelled to consider alternatives - "some coercive method" - in direct violation of their liberal beliefs. One dilemma leads inexorably to the next: technology produces overpopulation, overpopulation threatens the world, the world must consider "coercive methods".

Overpopulation — Marxist approach

To understand the "overpopulation" in the world today, we must look at the class-structure of society as well as the technology being developed by science. Evidence suggests that there is something about the nature of a society itself that helps to determine how many children will be produced. Perhaps the most convincing argument for a social theory of population growth comes from a recent study done in India by the economist Mahmood Mamdani. During the years 1953-1959 the Harvard School of Public Health conducted a study of its own pilot program to control population growth in a village in the Punjab. In 1969 they initiated a follow-up study on their attempts to introduce birth-control devices among a group of Indian farmers. Everyone agreed that the program was a failure. But why would the poor farmers of India, among the world's most impoverished people, refuse birth control when it was offered through the medium of a well-organized, well-financed, intensive program? The liberal experts were baffled.

Mamdani, using a Marxist analysis, found something quite different. Relating his study of the project's failure to caste and class relationships in the village, he discovered that poor villagers consciously view their children as labor assets. Increasing land fragmentation combines with the new opportunities in post-colonial India to provide special incentives to the poor family for the production of many children. If most of the children could work at agriculture and other jobs, the combined efforts of the family might be enough to put one child through school and into a bureaucratic post. Then the family would have some hope of economic security or even advancement. Even if this dream did not come true, the presence of numerous children among the poorest families was viewed as a cost-saving device. One villager explained: "Why pay 2,500 rupees for an extra hand? Why not have a son?" The message is clear. For the poor in this village in India, children are not a "population bomb," but rather a means of survival and even advancement for the entire family. Though society as a whole is threatened by the production of large families, each family, competing with other families, must try to keep its labor costs as low as possible, and one's own children are the cheapest form of labor that can be found.

But how does a society get itself into a situation where poor people, in order to survive, must act in ways that are ultimately irrational and highly dangerous for the world as a whole? A recent study by the anthropologist Benjamin White provides further insight. Using a "demand-for-labor" analysis, White attempts to account for the rapid population growth of Java, a region similar to India in many ways. Noting the pressures of the Dutch sugar industry in the nineteenth century on land and labor available for Javanese family farms, White concludes that indigenous controls on population growth had to be lifted in order to produce child laborers who could work the family farms while adults went off to work for the sugar factories. As population thus increased, land holdings became even smaller, creating even further pressures for more laborers to work the small rice fields of Java more intensively.

Putting these two studies together, we can see that while modern technology and modern medicine may have played a role in the development of the population problem of today, the most significant factor, the pressures on individual families to produce large numbers of children, was created by the particular labor needs of the colonial system of profit-making and is perpetuated by the social relationships which that system has produced. It is not technology or medicine which produced the population problem and keep making it worse. It is capitalism.

With this analysis in hand, the science-ethics dilemma of population disappears. Since populations can be controlled when the social and economic conditions allow, a clear and straightforward solution emerges: If each family in the poorest nations produces large numbers of children to keep itself above water in the competition with other families to keep its farm-labor costs down, then the solution to the population problem lies primarily in reorganizing the production system so that co-operation can replace competition. Under these new conditions, birth control can be used in a positive manner; each family can plan the number of children in terms of the rational needs of the entire community, working together to produce food and other necessities for all. This is the essence of socialism.

Conclusion

The analysis of population developed above can be extended into other areas of the ecology crisis. Would corporations continue to pollute the water and air that workers must drink and breathe if those corporations were directly controlled by the workers? Would there be enough money to overcome existing ecological threats if the profits soaked up by big stockholders were distributed to pay for projects democratically decided upon by communities in which the factories and mines are located? It is not so much an ethics of science that we need - it is a science for the people.

Bill Delucia Pub Manager

The Queen's pub plays a very fundamental role here on campus, providing an atmosphere in which students may gather together for good times and good conversation. Bill DeLucia, a third year law student here at Queen's, fulfills the necessary activities of pub manager, and does a good job of it.

For instance, there have been some changes made in the Queen's pub over the past few months. Students noticed the shabby condition of the carpet upstairs, and complained about the dull effect created by bare walls. Downstairs in Wallace, a need for improvement was recognized as well.

Initially aware of these problems, and reinforced by student concern, Bill has made it his policy to remain as open-minded as possible when dealing with "consumer demand and consumer complaint". Evidence of this may be found in the new carpeting and graphic art designs now installed in the House of Commons, and the improved sound system and wider selection of music tapes in Wallace Hall. Even though it was argued that we the students were soon to move into a new drinking establishment, and that hence these improvements were unnecessary, the basic philosophy of trying to create as good an atmosphere as possible has led Bill and his two pub assistants, Ron Knox and Jim Russell, to draw on the funds of a successful summer operation in order to pump back into the student body those advantages which their money can provide. An average of $5,000 dollars per month finds its way back to some students in the form of staff wages; hence the pub as a good source of employment must also be recognized as one of its positive factors.

Bill DeLucia's position as manager, along with the responsibilities attributed to a married, third year law student, totally consume his time and efforts.

THANKS 5B - for a great party and to 5D for taking 'care' of us later! Welcome to the family 4E, isn't incest great! Hope to see 'more' of you next term! Love 3rd Gordon.

4TH GORDON: Fantastic Party! Thanx a million! It's clear as the writing on the wall, we were meant for each other. Love, Bubbles and the girls of East Chown.

DEAR DON (not Dear John, but Dear Don), you said you'd be there, and I was but you weren't....but that's okay...I guess...I'm hurt, but I understand, and accept the way you are. I still want to be your friend.

TWO ROOMS available at West Campus, Jean Royce Hall, for 2nd term. Rooms 404 and 405 Healey House. Please call either 549-2064 or 549-2070.

DEAR 5D - Don't worry, there's lots more to come. Seeing is believing. I'll be over soon to pick out 5 or 6 of your best for the weekend. Jim.

TIRED OF WARM BEER? Have we got a deal for you. A 2-year old bar fridge. Only $75.00, good condition. Interested? Call 549-3960.

19 YEARS AGO yesterday was a very important day. Happy Birthday Marilyn; and I do believe that the skating team is comparable to the men's Canadian Volleyball Team.

DEAR 4TH BRUCE. Many thanks for Friday night's party. You guys are great! We owe you one. Love, the women of East Chown (the wild ones).

GAEL GROUP 67 - well group, it's finally happening! We're having a reunion. Friday, Nov. 28th (that's today, frosh) inside the Union. Perpetual tales, (guess who?) look upstairs in the pub. P.S. 8:00pm, Ad, Mic and Maybe Steve.

FREC GROUP 24 (Johneeee included) you're invited to our reunion - somebody's gotta show up! Mic & Ad (Gael Group 67). P.S. Sorry about Friday night John - Mic.

JOY-HAPPY 21ST BIRTHDAY, what can we say? Have a great year. It's been real. Love Cath, Marg, Nins, Boz. Oh-How High School.

WANTED TO RENT: quiet couple with no children or pets want a quiet house anywhere in the city, or a quiet 2 bedroom apartment close to Queen's and hospitals. Call 544-1361.

A PRETTY CALICO CAT will be up for adoption at the Humane Society on Monday. If you own it, you don't deserve to have an animal in your possession. If you don't, it's yours. Better try Friday to be on the safe side.

WANT TO SHARE a 2-bedroom apartment? Downtown. Reasonable rent. Occupancy from Jan 1st. Call Sten before Dec 17th, 544-5793.

DISCO II - The Christmas dance of the year is tonight from 8pm in the Lower Lounge of the International Centre.

Janice Atwood

This past Monday, the Performing Arts Office of Queen's presented Racine's Phedre at McArthur Hall. The play is based on the Greek myth of Phedra's 'incestuous' love for her stepson Hippolyte, and her mental turmoil in self-denial and finally admission of this fact. Further conflict is added to the central theme as the play progresses; Hippolyte is in love with the mortal Aricie; Thesee, father to Hippolyte and gallavanting husband to Phaedra, forbids Hippolyte's love of Aricie; and Hippolyte struggles to be 'pure' as opposed to his father.

Both the mythological and psychological aspects of the myth were portrayed, although Phaedra's turmoil was weakly put across. She is intended to be a strong personality, yet in the end she was merely being pushed around and manipulated by outside forces. Even the extent of her mental anguish was poorly portrayed, failing to show the desperate struggle against her own feelings for Hippolyte before she submitted to them and declared her love. This was due on the most part to the acting abilities of Jeanne David, who played Phaedra, but also to the interpretation of the play. Le Treteau de Paris, under the direction of Michel Hermon, placed unnecessary stress on the sexual connotations of the play to the point that Racine himself would have been shocked. Only the costumes 'undercut' the basic simplicity of the stage set, and these skimpy garments, coupled with much of the action, were undeniably overpowering to the theme of the play. In one instance, the interpretation of Aricie and Hippolyte's passion-struggle left no doubt at all in the audiences mind as to what was being portrayed on the stage. Moreover, much of the poetic rhetoric was droned out in such a manner as to detract from many of the beautiful French verses; at other times, the actors indulged in screaming and shouting. Frequently, the sense of what was being said in these dramatic outbursts was actually lost in the shouting.

Thesee is the most powerful personality in the performance from the moment of his entrance until the close of the play. The role of Thesee is played by Michel Hermon (the director), and is excellently done in spite of the performance's overall quality.

As the tummy turns

This column as originally envisioned was to appear weekly and offer descriptions of the cheaper places to eat in town. So much for original envisionments and stuff like that. Today's column will take quick looks at three area restaurants and give brief mention of the three other places already reviewed.

Hellas Restaurant and Tavern in Elrond College offers a wide selection of North American, Italian and Greek dishes, as well it is the only place reviewed that has a liquor license (Huzzahs from the back of the room).

I ordered a Greek dish, musaka (I hope that's how it's spelled), and a half bottle of wine. Unfortunately my first three wine choices were out of stock. Musaka is a dish consisting of squash and eggplant wrapped around ground beef with a meat and tomato sauce poured over top. At $3.50 it is slightly more expensive than other meals reviewed in this column, but it was well worth the money. The meal was in one word, excellent.

Hellas, as I have said, is a bit more expensive than the other restaurants reviewed, but occasionally when you'd like to go out to dinner and want to avoid the more economical places and the very expensive establishments, Hellas would be one place to try.

Chung Wah's is a familiar place to many students. Located beside Freddie's on University Avenue it is the closest restaurant to main campus. Chung Wah's as some may guess is a Chinese Restaurant. Some Canadian (American) dishes are available, but they are more expensive than several other restaurants (notably Morrison's). Chung Wah's offeres a great many Chinese dishes, but for those who don't know their Gunga Din from their Dai Dop there are six combination platters available. These range in price from $2.45 to $2.65. I had the number five: egg roll, chow mein and sweet and sour shrimp. The portion was filling and reasonably well-prepared, but I didn't enjoy the meal as much as the one I had at Seto's.

On Wednesday nights Mother's on Princess St. offers a .99 cent special. For your near-dollar you receive a non-large order of spaghetti with an option for a free second helping, plus a hunk of bread with each serving. The two servings probably equal one of their normal servings which cost $2.10, but at .99 cents it is a deal that can't be beat anywhere in town. If you count washing and cooking time you can't possibly make the same meal for that little.

Morrison's Restaurant on King Street has probably the best deals in town as far as North American style food and community atmosphere go. Seto's may be the best inexpensive Chinese Restaurant in Kingston. It's not much to look at but it is clean and friendly. The Square Rib, which I felt was a place to avoid has done the town a favour and shut down. Hurrah for the power of the press.

As the tummy churns will turn up again next term; until then remember if you can't be a cook stay out of the broth or something like that.

Raffi, a Toronto-based folk artist, will be performing at Bitter Grounds Saturday evening.

"Good Luck Boy", Raffi's first album, was produced in May on Troubador Records and was greeted with warm praise. His performances at the 1974 Winnipeg Centennial Folk Festival and at the 1975 Mariposa Festival have brought him to the attention of the Canadian folk music audience.

Critics are especially appreciative of Raffi's stage performances. His sense of humour complements his music to create total entertainment.

The music is carefully crafted work combining elements of Raffi's quick wit and serious thoughts. His voice offers a distinctive sound which commands respect from the audience.

One critic promised that, "Whether you like good music, or just want to be entertained, Raffi is the man to see.", so see him this Saturday at 8:00 P.M. at Clark Hall. Admission $2.25 with memberships at 75 cents.

Love and farce make the scene

Jennifer Conkie

Make Love To Me, the thirtieth production of the Queen's Drama Department's Chronicle series, consists of two highly entertaining and hilarious one-act plays. George Feydeau's two farces, One Husband-To-Be and Through the Window, rich in themselves with ludicrous situations and clever dialogues, are enhanced by excellent casting and acting, interesting costumes and a simple but attractive and effective set.

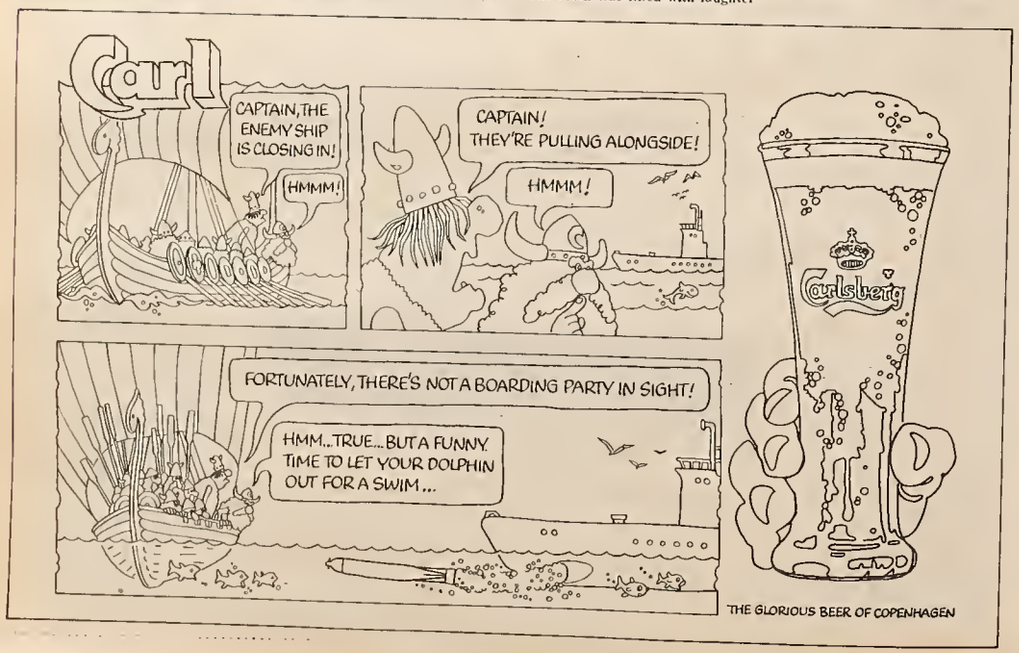
An enjoyable evening of farce



On Tuesday evening the audience was small, and with such a short distance between us and the actors, the atmosphere was intimate. This can work either for or against a production. In the case of farce and comedy, humour can be caught and carried through the audience more easily in a relaxed and friendly atmosphere. Still, the actors can succeed in making their audience laugh only if their performance is that compelling, and the decreasing of distance increases the audience's acuteness and ability to recognize ineffective acting. In the case of both of the plays which I saw, the appeal of the actors was tremendous and the room was filled with laughter at the very vital, very funny portrayals of the French bourgeois at their silliest.

Our Husband-To-Be is about two sisters in love with the same man who has made serious advances towards both but who ends up marrying another young heiress. The director, Bernard Burkom, is to be congratulated for perfect casting. Barbara Edwards gave an excellent performance as the glamorous Henriette de Treville, who at age twenty sees herself as a woman of the world, full of the wisdom of experience for advising her naively romantic younger sister. Stunning in black silk and diamonds, she smiles at herself in mirrors while her nineteen-year old sister stands dressed in less flattering attire, envious, embarrassed, but full of romantic dreams and hopes. Virginia Greig developed and delivered this part very well indeed. In general this play contained more subtleties than Through the Window, and these two fine young actresses responded more sensitively to these finer points of script and character.

Through the Window is more of a slapstick, straightforward comedy. Robert Hanks, as the righteous, somewhat pompous and sometimes pitiable barrister, Hector, was convincing in some scenes but inconsistent in others. Shelley Cavalier, as the violent and passionate Emma from Brazil, acted her part with a great amount of energy and movement, which I found a bit too much to take with no variety in tone or pace to make the presentation more interesting. However this may be a problem of the script rather than of the acting. Emma bursts in on Hector, a complete stranger, and demands that he make love to her to revenge her jealous husband. Hector is shocked and unwilling at first but as the situation grows more complex, and Emma and Hector alternately fall prey to the same jealousy that they abhor in their spouses, the outraged barrister desires a similar revenge on his wife. The situation is blatantly ridiculous and the humour is loud and blaring. The action of the farce is also fast and violent. There is even a "chase scene" around the room, with chairs and trays of food being knocked to the ground.

My personal preference was for the more subtle, more sensitive first play. However the audience laughed heartily at both, and the two were combined very carefully and artistically to provide a most enjoyable evening of farce.

Lin Rowe

Christmas music from the Baroque is the theme of a concert which is to take place in Sydenham St. United Church at 8:30 p.m. on Saturday, November 29, 1975. Admission is free. The concert is presented by the Music Department's Queen's Chamber Singers directed by Rudolf Schnitzler, assisted by F.R.C. Clarke at the organ, and members of the Queen's Chamber Orchestra.

The first half of the programme, representative of composers Giovanni Gabrieli, Heinrich Schuetz and Michael Praetorius, is all written for spatially separated double choirs, which was typical of the Venetian polychoral style with its rich contrapuntal writing. For this concert, the choirs will be singing from the north and south galleries of the church. After intermission, the choir will be joined by members of the Queen's Chamber Orchestra, with F.R.C.Clarke at the organ, for a performance of Marc-Antoine Charpentier's "Messe de Minuit pour Noel". This Mass is unique in that its melodies are based on a total of eleven noels (the popular French Christmas carols), which give the work a generally light, almost folk-like quality. Soloists are: Helen and Shelley McAlear, sopranos; Gail Hohner, contralto; Craig Tompkins, tenor; and Robert Hanks, baritone.

The Queen's Chamber Orchestra in concert

Queen's Chamber Singers was founded by Dr. Schnitzler in 1972. Assistant Professor of Music at Queen's, he is a musicologist who has specialised in Baroque performance practice, and thus, as a choral conductor, brings this insight and expertise to the direction of his choir. The twenty-seven voices, largely drawn from students in the Bachelor of Music programme, are selected after audition, for their vocal abilities. The orchestral accompaniment will be provided by a thirteen member woodwinds and strings group of instrumentalists from the Queen's Chamber Orchestra. The organist, Dr. F.R.C.Clarke is Professor of Music at Queen's, Conductor of the Kingston Choral Society, and Organist and Choirmaster at Sydenham Street United Church.

Calling all Arts

Classical music, drama, folk music, photography, art exhibits and workshops, films, poetry, music workshops, and more will all be included in Art Festival '76. Art Festival has been an annual, non-profit student run event for six years, and this years' week of activities planned for shortly after the Christmas break, promises to involve more Queen's students than ever. The events are being planned right now, and in addition to professional artists, many Queen's students are needed to perform and display their work, and to help in workshop. If you are interested in any of these events, or would like to help prepare Arts Festival, call the following people:

The Who By Numbers

Paul Luke

Pick one of the following statements and discuss: a) In "The Who By Numbers", said group tempers the characteristic violence of its attack in favour of a lighter style of a wistful, reflective nature. b) The curious restraint which pervades "The Who By Numbers" not only robs the music of much of its immediate impact but seriously impairs the credibility of those traces of anguish and bitterness which remain in leader Peter Townshend's compositions. c) The doddering rancour of this record's music combines with the palsied lyrics gasped from enfeebled vocal chords to form a brilliantly conceived vehicle for the expression of Peter Townshend's quaint lack of ease with growing old. Answer: Really I don't know what to think. When it came out maybe some people bought this album and would never think of flushing their water-closet while it was on. I know I wouldn't have let it stop me. Maybe Townshend's self-conscious concern with the dilemma of being an aging rock star got in the way of the vitality of the music just as the bloated ambition behind "Quadrophenia" sacrificed the explosive rock of "Who's Next" for flatulent pomposity. To many rock buffs of the time the Who at their best were a mean kind of nourishment which could bite back if you chewed too carelessly. What good is a box of rice crispies whose melodic skills are largely intact, who individually are capable of whipping the riboflavinic ass off any other musical cornflake but when you put them in your mouth all you get is a subdued snap, a geriatric crackle and a timorous pop? Townshend of course was the man responsible for the stuttering masterpiece of "My Generation," the epitomy of pubescent protest: "Hope I die before I get old." But in "The Who By Numbers" he's Mr. Complacency: "Hand me my checkbook and I'll crawl off to die." Poor Peter and his little crise de trente ans. If I had been a chagrined Who fan of the seventies after getting this embarrassing album I would have started hoping that he would die before he got old.

Gael droppers win

This Monday Queen's Hettleball team travelled to Port Carling to play the P.C. Preeners in an invitational tournament. Among the competitors were the Minden Marauders, Harrisville's Harrassers, and the top team in the league, the Galloping Gougers from Gravenhurst.

The first match began in a frenzy but as the teams settled down, it became obvious that it was going to be a long, hard-driving game. Even before the first hettle was dropped, a fight broke out on the floor. Mitch Vivian of the Hettleball Gaels was benched for a period of two minutes for low-dropping, and the Harrassers got a penalty drop costing the Gaels 4 points. Quick to gain lost time, Queen's proceeded to drop four hettles in the next three minutes, gaining on the Harrassers 16-4. These were dropped by Ted Torgenson, Eddie O'Reilly, Shawn McCann, and Mike Kelly.

The second match, against the Galloping Gougers, proved even more successful for the Gaels, as the final score was 48-12. Fine hettleguarding was displayed by Rob Riley throughout the match, and two outstanding drops were made by a new addition to the team, Ken Torgenson. (Both of the "Torgenson Terrors" are showing a lot of promise for the rest of this years season.)

Although the Queen's Hettleball Gaels have received comparatively little coverage until recently, they hope to change this situion...they certainly deserve more appreciation for their efforts. In order to gain more publicity, the Hettleball Gaels hope to go Co-ed next season.

The Wic Co-ed Volleyball season has come to an end with three dynamic teams rising to the top. In first place was PHE '78 with the combined talents of Marshall, McKay, Stretton, Nobie, Kelly Solonika, Aikman, Cameron, Cox, Mackin and Cambell. Arts '78 fell into second place closely "digging" at the heels of PHE with McDonald, Tate, Lawton, Scales, Wilson, Fairchild, and Mooney. "Bumping" up behind Arts '78 was Education, with Maki, Snider, Lahy, Hey, and Paicra "setting" the pace. Congratulations to all twenty teams who participated!

Commerce '76 1st in standings

Paul Findlay

Last Friday and Saturday evenings the Interfaculty Indoor Softball Tournament was held. On Friday night Arts beat P.H.E., 2-1, Grads took Engineering, 4-2, and Law tripled the score on Commerce, 6-2. In Saturday's action Grads beat P.H.E., 5-3 but then lost to Law, 6-4. Arts edged Engineering, 3-2 but then was defeated by Commerce, 5-2. This set the stage for the final between Law and Commerce. These teams had met in the 1st round with Law coming out on top. However, in the 1st inning in the rematch with 2 out, Commerce put 6 runs across the plate. Commerce became the Interfaculty Indoor Softball Champions by virtue of its 7-0 victory.

In the Bews Indoor Softball competition the quarter-finals and semi-finals were played last week. Commerce '76 beat Bus. Grads, 5-1, Arts '77 took Commerce '77, 6-2, P.H.E. edged Commerce '79, 5-3, and Arts '76 doubled up on Mechanical, 10-5. So once again the top 3 teams were in the semi-finals. Both the semi-final games were topsided. Arts '77 clobbered Commerce '76, 10-0, and P.H.E. overpowered Arts '76, 12-0. The first game of the finals was played Tuesday night with the powerful Arts '77 team crunching P.H.E., 18-2. The second and third games (the latter if necessary) were played Wednesday and Thursday night.

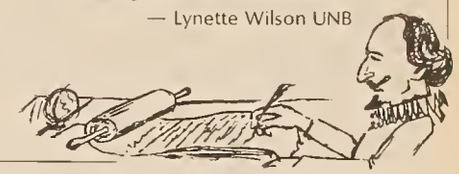
The Volleyball semi-final games were played last Thursday P.H.E., Education and Chemical beat Commerce '78, Arts '77 and Bus. Grads respectively all in 2 games. Defending champs Mining edged Civil-Math 2 games to 1. Both the semi-finals and finals were played last night. P.H.E. met Chemical and Mining took on Education in the semi-finals with the winners playing a best 3 of 5 series.

In Innertube Waterpolo, in the last of the quarter-final games Arts '78 beat Commerce '76, 6-5. In the semi-finals Commerce '77 and Arts '77 beat Arts '78 and Education to advance to the finals. The finals were a two-game total point series. At the end of the first half of the first game the score was tied at 2-2 but then the Arts team exploded for 5 goals letting in only 2 to take the first game 7-4. Down 3 goals Commerce '77 had its work cut out for it. They outscored Arts '77 3-1 in the first half, to pull within 1 goal. In the final half they scored 4 goals to Arts '77's 2 goals. The 2nd game result was then 7-3. This gave Commerce '77 the series 11 goals to 10 to make them Bews Innertube Waterpolo Champions. Don Langill and Ross Fraser paced the winners with 4 goals each. D. McMillan had 6 goals for the losers.

Managers of Rec Hockey League Teams are reminded to get their payment for ice in by December 5.

Athletic sticks are reminded of the M.I.A.C. meeting next Wednesday and that entries for Basketball, Ball Hockey, Curling and Waterpolo are due the next morning.

Standings have been changed this week with the addition of points for Horseshoes, Doubles Tennis, Innertube Waterpolo and entry points for Broomball. As a result of P.H.E.'s mixup of Broomball entry they have slipped into 3rd place. But note that even if they had entered Broomball, Commerce '76 would be in the lead. Also Commerce '77 has passed Civil-Math in the battle for 4th spot. Standings are:



1. Comm '76	27,663
2. Arts '77	26,755
3. P.H.E.	25,394
4. Comm '77	23,140
5. Civil-Math	22,432
6. Law '77	21,482
7. Arts '76	20,480
8. Bus. Grads	19,511
9. Mech.	19,248

Invasion of library

Dear Editors:
During exam time libraries are noisier than at any other time during the school year

I feel that all new students who need absolute quiet for work, and have to use the Douglas Library to prepare for the coming exams, deserve this warning.

Let me explain. During the year roughly the same people use, for instance, the purple room, every evening, and things are usually pretty quiet. But at exam times a herd of philistines, whose intellectual forms have never before graced the library gates, (at least within living memory), invades. Each individual philistine is convinced that he has come to the library to study. Actually, he has not come to study, but to convince himself that he is studying. He believes that merely being within the hallowed halls of the Douglas will magically infuse him with enough knowledge to pass his exams. He is sure that this knowledge will be given to him no matter what he does while in the library. Accordingly, he does whatever he fancies while "studying".

The philistine engineer usually runs around to see his muscular friends so that he can discuss the stress lines in the female form. The philistine commerce student loves statistically determing the number of times he can hit the nearest garbage can with a wad of calculus notes. The philistine English or history student, like the philistine engineer, usually seeks out his friends, but unlike the engineer, he ever discusses anything with them except such intellectually stimulating topics as interior elitism in occupied Guatemala.

I am sure that anyone who needs absolute quiet for work can see the problem that these philistines present. Of course, it is possible to easily avoid a few of them. For instance, one can avoid sitting anywhere near an obvious girlfriend-boyfriend team, for they are probably philistine students of some sort, and will most likely do nothing but affectionately giggle at each other for the next two hours, at which time they will go for a "coffee".

Although it is possible to avoid a few of the philistine students in this way, it is quite impossible to avoid the majority. They are everywhere during exam time.

More hot air on smoking

Dear Editors:
Queen's Journal
Mr. Snider very aptly has an axe to grind in favour of non-smokers and their personal space However, it must be recognized that while he may be the Chairman of the Sociology D.S.C.'s, he does not have any special prerogatives to speak as such to the Head of the Department without a mandate from the D.S.C.'s as a whole. This violation of ethics should be noted. The methodology of intimidation is not without sanction.

We have been experiencing, far too often, misuse of quasi-political powers on this campus and it is becoming increasingly difficult to know exactly what the students favour, or what whims are being catered to over certain issues.

I, as a non-smoker, do not have objections to smokers. My personal concerns over a limited ban of smoking in classes is that a referendum be held university wide before such imposition be permitted. If it is the contention of the student body that this ban be inaugrated, then so be it.

As a tutor myself, I could not or would not suggest that no smoking be in effect in any classes I conduct. People are uptight enough without further sanctions.

John J. Vollmann

Review: The entire production lacked direction, as it is incredible that the actors even got through at all. Although there appeared at first to be a potential for some interesting sexual encounters, all the female cast had vanished by the opening of the third and final act. The dialogue was dull and uninspired, and even though the start seemed somewhat slow, the ending was definitely rushed

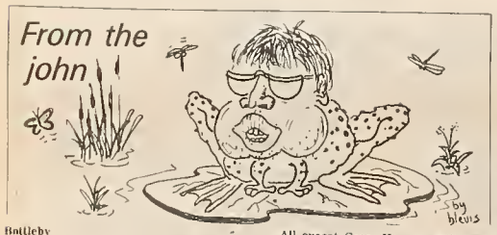
A gathering storm

We hear good news and bad news.
First the good news: the provincial government intends to take a hard look at its growing spending programs.

Now the bad news: The special committee appointed to review government spending has recommended that tuition fees by increased by 65 per cent, that the loan portion of OSAP awards be increased from $800 to $1800, and that the ceiling on total OSAP support be cut by $1000.

For students from less than affluent backgrounds the bad news constitutes ugly news, bloodthirsty news, warring news. Their chance for a university education might be eliminated because they will not be able to afford $1000 fees and a $7200 debt at the end of their university career.

According to the report, the alternative is to shear total university staff from 11,000 to 8,300. The committee assumes that the only measure of a university's productivity is the staff-student ratio.



This move is a part of a gathering storm. On November 18 of last year the Ministry of Colleges and Universities announced an increase in funding for universities only half of that required to maintain Quality in Ontario universities. "Ouch!" cried the pinched post-secondary community. Massive deficits, substantial cuts in spending and reduced services resulted.

In view of this decreased support, universities asked if this indicated a critical departure from government educational policy. The government, with an election on the way, officially stuck to its standing policy: to maintain the quality of education and existing levels of service, and to ensure that financial barriers did not compromise accessibility to post-secondary institutions. In retrospect, this may only be a case of saying one thing while doing another.

Universities have seared the fat, have even sliced a little of the lean. Now the special committee thirsts for more.

With the release of the report, debate now centres in the political sphere. A front page Globe and Mail story suggested that, as a political act, boosting the university fee by 65 per cent will be too strong for Queen's Park stomachs. It should never have been on the menu.

However, the swing of public opinion against strong support for post-secondary education give these recommendations a threatening thrust. Students must parry and counter or serve as whipping boys for the provincial government.

Bottleby

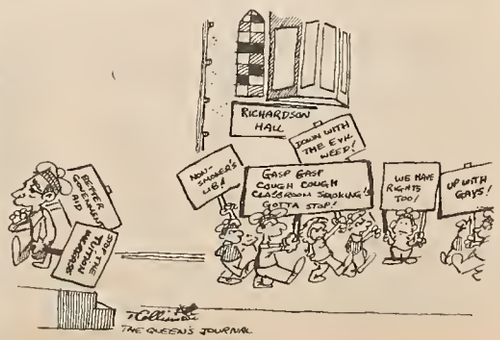
The pumpkin patch was in an uproar. Someone had stolen all the pumpettes. "Oh deary me" was the general concensus.

Without pumpettes, there could be no ballet class. And without ballet class no one would be able to see. This was clearly to be avoided.

A meeting was hastily called The chief pumpkin called it to order. "Alright men, we all know the problem. The sun of gnus sinks without a song of sing, I intend to work on the honour principle. I want everyone to close his eyes, and when we open them, I want to see all our pumpettes back

He closed his eyes and when he opened them again his watch was gone.

"Listen, men. The wind grows long toes at the feet of the trees and chickens are flying north invest. When drilling for snow, keep always to Hume. And give back my watch."



The silence deepened. Soon they were all asleep, probably bored. They all dreamed of their lost pumpettes.

All except Grop. He was guilty one, of course. He wanted to rule the pumpkin patch. Lives meant nothing to him. Many had fallen to his ambition.

Nobody liked Grop. He had warts and cross eyes. He had a mean disposition too. He once drove over his own grandmother for laughs.

Grop spent the night gloating. "They'll have to give in now." Soon they'll be blind and Frog-land will be triumphant." Grop had been brain-washed by the Froglords years ago, and was now no more than a toady to them, which explains his warts. Now, the Froglords appeared to be on the verge of triumph.

Unknown to them, a new force was arising in the pumpkin patch. A shining new pumpkin was evolving a brain capable of moving large inanimate objects. The next morning he inadvertantly moved a large rock on top of the sorcerer supreme of Frogland. The spell was broken and all the pumpkins were reunited with their pumpettes. Even Grop was rehabilitated, and wound up as a pie on President Ford's Thanksgiving table.

Library lacks 544 health care serials

Case

Miss Virginia Parker, Head Health Sciences Librarian, has said that the number of serials to which her library can afford to subscribe (956) is poor compared to other Canadian health sciences libraries. "We should have 1500-- that would bring us up to standard," she said.

Sarah Yarnell

The Health Sciences library is understaffed, has exceeded its space limitations and subscribes to disturbingly few periodicals. Miss Virginia Parker, Head Health Sciences Librarian, explained that her budget currently allows for only 956 serials, which is poor compared to other Canadian health sciences libraries. "We should have 1500-- that would bring us up to standard," she said

The serials, primarily medical journals, contain articles on the most recent developments in health care.

Pointing to the number of serials at other health sciences libraries, Miss Parker argued that the number of periodicals to which Queen's subscribes is insufficient "unless the judgment of these other people is terribly warped--unless they're buying things they don't want."

Since 1969, 155 subscriptions have been cancelled, most of them "very necessary," she protested. Before cuts are made, a list is circulated to all faculty members; if any protest the cancellation of a particular subscription, then a substitution is made if the periodical is not available elsewhere

Miss Parker said that the library is forced to use inter-library loan too frequently "We're borrowing things a small library should have "

The library has no reference librarian, the person professionally trained to help students locate material. The Liaison Committee on Medical Education "wondered why," when they inspected the library in August, 1972, she said.

There are three professionals on staff. Miss Parker, a cataloguer and a serials librarian, as well as eight non-professionals. Miss Parker said that although many individuals require assistance during the evening, and are unable to come to the library between 9am and 5pm, no professionals are available to help users find information after 5pm She claimed this is quite a serious problem

The library had a reference librarian for 18 months prior to March 1975 on a grant from the Ministry of Health

Queen's professors and students in medicine, nursing, rehabilitation therapy and life sciences use the library In a city that claims to be a medical centre, Miss Parker said, the practicing physicians should be using it too, but are not She said she supposed that they consult one another, and "use the telephone a lot."

The library is currently growing by about 3600 volumes a year, but Miss Parker said that a more ideal rate would be 5000. As it is, the books have already exceeded the space, and 10,000 of the total 53,400 are in storage in Douglas library Space for reading is limited, she said.

The Old Arts Building, home of the drama department and the Theological College, also serves as the library's current location. Miss Parker said she hoped the new library in the Health Sciences Complex, soon to be built, would be ready by December 1977. Even there space would be insufficient, she predicted, as the 25,000 square feet of space would be full by 1984. She commented that when she came to Queen's from Houston, Texas, she was told she would have to put up with the library in the Old Arts Building for only two years. She has now been here for over eight years, but construction on the new library is to begin this month

Faculty union considered at U of Windsor

WINDSOR (CUP)--A political science professor at the University of Windsor believes faculty should not unionize because of the need for "a system which disciplines its members; one which makes quality the prime objective; not one that rewards mediocrity.

The comments from Dr. Lloyd Brown-John come at a time when the Windsor faculty association is discussing constitutional changes which would enable it to apply to the Ontario Labour Relations Board for certification as a bargaining unit.

According to Brown-John, a vocal opponent of the proposal, unionization "protects the weaklings - those faculty members who provide poor teaching and have a low production rate as regards research."

He feels the Windsor faculty will reject unionization because they are afraid to "rock the apple cart" and because it is a "retrogressive step."

Unionization, he contends, leads to strikes which only hurt students and faculty research.

Dr. Anthony Blackburne, faculty association president, disagrees, and maintains that unionization would bring equitable compensation for faculty members, increased job security and improvements in working conditions.

If faculty members approve the constitutional changes the association will seek certification from the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

Carleton faculty became the first in Ontario to certify after considerable debate last summer, and have now ratified a two-year contract. No strike was necessary or even threatened

Windsor plans OFS fee vote

WINDSOR (CUP)--The student's union at the University of Windsor will hold a referendum asking students to pay $1.50 per year to join the Ontario Federation of Students.

Windsor is currently an observer at OFS conferences and has not paid fees since the financial collapse of their student union two years ago.

No date has been set for the referendum.

Skeletons reveal history of first North Americans

The Canada Council has awarded an $8,000 grant to Dr. Nancy S. Ossenberg of Queen's University's anatomy department, for a study of skeletal remains from archeological sites in the Aleutian Islands, southwestern Alaska and the western Plains of North America.

Representing more than 2,000 individuals, the remains date from 2000 B.C. to the end of the last century. The objectives of the research are to identify early populations, trace their affinities, and help reconstruct history prior to the arrival of Europeans.

To date, Dr. Ossenberg has traced the lineages of the Dakota and Cheyenne tribes to burial mound complexes dating from A.D. 800 to 1700 in the eastern periphery of the Plains

"Although many regard these famous tribes as the prototype of the North American Indian, their Woodland ancestors lived a simpler and quite different kind of life," Dr. Ossenberg said. At the time of European contact, about A.D. 1700, cultural change accelerated so rapidly among the Cheyenne and Dakotas that lineages could never have been traced back to the Woodlands Indians by comparing styles of artifacts, such as pottery or weapons, found in the burial mounds.

"Surprisingly, the physical characteristics of the people appear to have changed very little, even though as much as 800 years separates some of the early mound-building groups from their 19th century descendents," she said.

SVB News

Countdown to exams has begun, and believe it or not we're still receiving requests for volunteers. Just a few reminders:

-if you are a volunteer, have you picked up your newsletter?

- if you signed up and haven't been contacted by the Agency of your choice, stop by the office and we'll see what can be done to remedy the situation.

- if you have a free afternoon a week there are several programmes in need of volunteers at Millhaven Pen. There is a bus at 12:45 at the Shopping Centre that gets to the Pen around 1:15. So if you could tutor elementary level Math or English, correspondence courses or be a part of a living skills discussion group - think about it now, stop by, sign up and you could start in January.

- if you speak Italian, there is an inmate at Collin's Bay who needs a one-to-one tutor - he can't speak English at all and needs some support.

Our office hours are 12:30-4:30 in the Grey House, come over and talk to Pam about what you can do in January. If we don't write another column (exams - papers you know!) we'll say happy holidays to all from all of us!

The charred rear end of the 1975 Pinto station wagon and the Norton 850 Commando motorcycle, victims of a fire in the parking garage of Elrond College.

Elrond: car, bike burn

At 1:50 am Sunday, the fire alarm sounded in the underground parking garage at Elrond College. An automatic sprinkler system was set in motion when the alarm went off.

Members of the Kingston Fire Department arrived a few minutes later to find a car and a motorcycle burning. The sprinklers prevented the fire from causing damage to more than the rear end of the 1975 Pinto wagon. Steve Skalitzky,owner of the three-month-old car said that his car was parked right by the fire stairs. The damage is between $400 and $600, Skalitzky said. There is a burn mark on the gas tank and the car was "scorched from the gas," he said.

Doug Kennedy, owner of the 850 Commando motorcycle estimated that the repair bill might be as high at $1,000. The lid of the gas tank on the motorcycle was opened. It is suspected that the gas from the bike was used to ignite the car.

Police are investigating the fire; arson is suspected. To a witness, it appeared that someone had tried to set the car on fire and had failed at first. It appeared that the motorcycle was moved beside the car and used to set the car on fire.

Several of the locked exit doors had been jimmied, apparently to serve as exits for the arsonist(s), despite the fact that there are unlocked fire exits.

Nominations needed for teaching award

Nominations for the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching are being solicited from Queen's students, faculty and alumni.

The Alumni Award, to be presented at Spring Convocation, consists of a Certificate of Merit and a cash award of $1,000.

Candidates for the award must be full-time members of the Queen's University teaching staff, who have completed three years of full-time teaching duties at Queen's. Candidates should have a comprehensive knowledge of the subject they teach. They should be habitually well prepared for teaching sessions including lectures, laboratories, seminars and tutorials.

Nominators should strive to choose professors who have enthusiasm for the subject and the capacity to arouse interest in it among the students. The candidates should also encourage student participation in the teaching-learning process

Setting a high standard and successfully motivating students to attain such a standard is also an important criterion to keep in mind. Professors who communicate effectively at levels appropriate to the students' capacity are the type that the award strives to recognize

The utilization of methods of evaluation of student performance which stress an understanding of the subject, rather than just the ability to memorize is a further criterion to be considered by nominators and evaluators. The nominees should be accessible to students outside of class hours and have a reputation for superior teaching and be recognized for this quality by students and colleagues alike

Nominations must be signed by five students, faculty or alumni and be submitted to the Director of Alumni Affairs, Queen's University by 19 January, 1976 Nominations should include the candidate's name in full; his faculty and discipline, a brief biographical outline, including education and experience; and reasons for recommending him for the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching

All nominations will be considered by the Teaching Awards Committee, which consists of faculty, student and alumni representatives The recommendation of the Committee will be forwarded to the Executive Committee of the Board of Directors of the Alumni Association, which has final responsibility for approving the Award the skeletons had changed so little, she was able to identify these ancestral links despite the cultural changes.

Dr. Ossenberg began her research in 1963 as a graduate student at the University of Toronto. She has studied bones in museums in the United States and Canada. By concentrating on specific bone traits and noting their absence or presence, she was able to devise a computer program which would reveal the ancestral proximity or biological distance between one skeleton and another.

The research project has continued through the years she taught at the University of Alberta (1969-73) and since her arrival at Queen's in 1973

The next phase of her study will attempt to trace the lineages further back in time and to the northwest, where the remote ancestors of the Americans first entered the New World after crossing from Asia over the Bering Land Bridge some 50,000 to 12,000 years ago.

The rewards of analysing skeletons for historical information are not restricted to identifying people and tracing their affinities, Dr. Ossenberg said. Many researchers are studying bones and teeth to find out about other aspects of life in early times, such as diet, health, disease, injuries, longevity and some social customs.

Interschool sports study

A research contract of $37,500 for the study of the role of interschool sports programs in Ontario secondary schools has been awarded to Queen's University by the Ontario Minister of Education. The Minister requested proposals for such a study, and chose that of Dr. Donald MacIntosh, director of Queen's School of Physical and Health Education and Dr Allan King, professor in the Faculty of Education.

Field research coordinator for the project, Jane Petterson, explained that 100 questionnaires will be sent to selected secondary schools in the province followed by detailed interviews with representatives of approximately ten of the schools.

"The investigation is being undertaken to determine the extent to which the original objectives of the interschool sports programs are being met," Miss Petterson said "We are interested in the effect of inflation, especially on travel and officials' costs for the athletic program," she added.

A preliminary report is to be submitted to the Minister of Education in June 1976 with the final report due in December 1976.

Unlit cyclists illegal at night

Nancy Bowes

On November 3, at 7:15pm, a second-year Queen's student was struck by a car while riding her bicycle.

Sally Southey was taken to hospital where eighteen stitches closed the wound above her right eye. She missed a week of classes and it was two full weeks before she could read or study effectively again.

Now the case is going to court. In addition to the charges against the driver of the car, Southey has been charged with failing to carry on the front of her bicycle a white or amber lighted lamp, a violation according to the Highway Traffic Act of Ontario. Her light had been malfunctioning for a few days prior to the accident.

Cycling is a popular mode of transportation in Kingston and Southey is concerned that students do not understand the full implications of the laws regarding cyclists. Southey is being fined $28.

A quick check at the Kingston Police Department revealed the requirements for cyclists Sgt Smith told the Journal that all cyclists are supposed to hold licenses for their bicycles.

The law also requires a light on the front of the bike, "one-half hour after sunset to one-half hour before sunrise." Sgt. Smith was careful to point out, however, that the important thing is that "they can see you." The popular practise of attaching a light to the arm or leg is satisfactory. Smith said that "nobody's gong to charge you," as long as there is a light

Dollar Bill

"The apex of the pinnacle"

Terry Collins

William Allen adopted the name Dollar Bill because, he said, there wasn't much he wouldn't do for a dollar.

Dollar Bill arrived at Queen's in the early 1920's and worked as a waiter in Marshall Reid's cafeteria next to Kingston Hall. The cafeteria had been erected during World War One when Grant Hall was being used as a two story hospital. Bill later ran a booth in the old Jock Harty Arena and sold refreshments there for many years. When business was slow during the intermissions, Bill was known to don skates and sell his goods from the ice. In the fall, Dollar Bill would travel on all the out-of-town trips with the football team. Refusing to accept a ticket for his passage, Bill often climbed on top of the railway car and would shinny along to the back of the train. He would then re-enter behind the conductor. Afterwards, the players, for lack of something better to do, would tickle Bill, which he couldn't stand and may have caused him to leave Queen's.

A gate crasher of considerable talent, he once eluded a special contingent of AMS guards during a performance in Grant Hall.

Bill left Queen's and bought a cottage in Barriefield which he hired out for parties. He subsequently purchased an old aircraft hangar in which he operated a speakeasy during prohibition. His supplies came mostly from Quebec. One time he re-entered Ontario with his goods in the back of an ambulance, another time he came in from Montreal with a hearse full of booze.

To Bill, the law stated that no unauthorized person could sell liquor kept on his property and Bill respected this. He classified the Cataraqui River as Crown property and thereby used it for storage. His shack was partitioned by blankets suspended from wires and was decorated by pictures of girls in bathing suits which he'd clipped from the newspapers. Women either were never allowed into the establishment and were served lemonade in their cars, or were often there and of questionable repute, depending on which source one chooses to accept. Bill ran a tight ship, though. One story relates that an exuberant client hollering for a drink at two am was persuaded to leave by a shotgun blast through the door.

Bill reportedly made the best Tom Collins in the country, using three ounces of gin and fruit juice. He sold forty ounce bottles for three dollars, his Tom Collins went for 50c. Dollar Bill's misuse of large words was also renowned. His most famous expression described the ultimate: "The Apex of the Pinnacle."

In a 1928 Journal interview, Bill declared that Napoleon and the Kaiser had reached the apex, but no one had reached the Apex of the Pinnacle. He also had "a great abomination for titulation". The Journal noted, too, that Bill's ancestry went back to the Mayflower.

Apparently Bill never went to jail. According to one source, "If the magistrate or judge happened to be one of Bill's clients, neither party gave the slightest hint of acquointanceship."

After Bill's death in 1945, Robertson Davies (Arts '36) wrote a short play centered around the Kingston character Bill is still remembered for his generosity to children and to people hardest hit by the depression. Many recall seeing him riding his bike to town to pick up the groceries or sitting in Morrison's smoking a smelly cigar. Dollar Bill left an estate of $6,000, reportedly all in bills.

Profile: GALE BLANK AND JANE BRYANT; WOMEN'S OFFICE

GAIL BLANK JANE BRYANT

The Women's Office has been in existence at Queen's since this past September, under the direction of Gale Blank and Jane Bryant, and is located in the north-west corner on the first floor of the Student's Union. The purpose of this organization is theoretically "to raise the consciousness and awareness over women's issues, and to act as a sounding board for problems arising out of this field."

However, in practice, Gale laments that this attempt to raise awareness amongst the women here at Queen's has received little, if any, response. Although a great amount of time and advertising was put into the initiation of consciousness-raising sessions within the residences, interested turnout was anything but good. It seems surprising that on a campus which houses so many active female students, participation in this area should be so poor. Unfortunately, the Women's Office has remained pretty much confined to its original enrollment of five or six dedicated members, who have been unable thus far to solicit any widespread involvement. Consequently, it exists largely as a resource centre, and as a representative student voice. Both Gale and Jane have sat on numerous committees, and have been recruited as delegates to various conferences. Within the last two months, they have attended the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada Conference, in Ottawa, and the Fourth Annual Conference of Women in Colleges and Universities, in Toronto. Both conferences Gale reports as being largely the same, in that although many issues were discussed, and outside contacts gained, a general feeling of desperation prevailed over any attempts to actually get things going. This concern with a real inability to make progress has led Gale to concentrate in the building up of a library and file within the present office, so that a solid base may be left from which future participants might organize their ambitions.

Alongside of their position within the Women's Office, Gale and Jane are involved in a large amount of committee work, write for the Lictor, have been active in Open House, and continue to support the Kingston Women's Centre, as well.

Art and free expression

Dear Editors:
I must take exception to the letter in the Journal entitled 'Artist had no pollution right'. The apparent conclusion of this article was that an artist does not have the right to display his work of art to the public if they are unavoidable and offensive. Thus, according to the writer, the destruction of these works is justified. He uses the sensational example of a 'dead baby on a pitchfork sprayed with plastic', hardly comparable to the pollution sculpture, but nevertheless powerful in its shock value. However he has changed the medium from inanimate cement to a once animate human body which brings in other considerations for it not to be displayed.

The argument that anyone with a purpose is not necessarily justified to impose it on the public is accompanied by a moral issue dealing with killing people to control population, which is not applicable to the discussion of the artist and a sculpture which is incapable of 'murder'. But if one does follow this argument, are those who altered the sculture more justified than the artist to impose their opinions on the public?

If it were possible for the artist-turned-caterer, to produce inoffensive, mind-stagnating works, then no one's conscience would be disturbed by such sculptures. Perhaps with some effort one could ban all potentially offensive television programmes, burn ugly architectural giants, and censor all books which could come into the hands of the 'considerable portion' who could be offended.

If, one has the right to change or destroy others' expressions of emotion which one has labelled offensive, one has deprived the individual of his supposed right to express himself freely. Bearing this in mind, one must define what is meant by 'offensive' and what percentage is meant by a 'considerable portion'.

Answer this question: Does the artist have any rights in presenting his true opinion to the public? If you answer yes, don't get uptight if some people are upset about the alteration of this particular artist's expression.

Just horsin' 'round folks

Dear Editors,
An important item has come to my attention, that I feel is my duty to pass on to other students.

During the greater part of this term, there has been a great deal of talk concerning homosexuality on campus. A lot of people really don't want to talk about it, and in fact, are quite offended by such free and open discussion of the matter.

The fact is that it does not have to exist. Apparently, since 1968, some unknown party has been putting Estrogens in the drinking water supply to Queen's University.

If the culprit can be brought to justice, the presence of homosexuality on campus will soon be ended.

Ontario gov't giving little support

Dear Editors:
Dr. J.R Evans, President of the University of Toronto, and Chairman of the Council of Ontario Universities, wrote an article in the Globe and Mail November 18, correctly outlining the collision course Ontario universities are currently set on, because of the Ontario Government's policy of reducing university funding whilst maintaining and even encouraging accessibility to Ontario universities. The figures that he listed in the table (above) do not bring out fully enough the real decline in Government support for the Ontario universities during the last five years. In 1970-71 (as Dr. Evans records earlier in the article), Ontario led the whole country in its generous support of university education as measured by the grants per full-time equivalent student. In both 1971-72, and 72-73, Ontario came third to Alberta and British Columbia. fn 1973-74, Ontario was the sixth province, and for the current year, is projected to occupy the penultimate position. How long will it be before Ontario sinks to the bottom of the league? fn dollar terms, Ontario was paying $45 below the National Average in its support per full-time equivalent student in 1973-74, and this year the figure will be an alarming $263 below the National Average. The real effect of this diminishing support is the very severe erosion in the quality of education that students in Ontario Universities are now experiencing: larger classes, out-of-date facilities, fewer contact hours with professors, the best teachers moving to other provinces, those that remain receiving less real reward for their increased services than some other sections of the community. The universities can do very little to avert the collision themselves, as about 98 per cent of their operating revenue is controlled by the Ontario Government either directly (through grants) or indirectly (through tuition fees).

Yours sincerely,
Mr. Peter A Bly
Assistant Professor

Inadequate benefits for epileptics

Oear Editors,
I am writing on behalf of a particular segment of the "permanently unemployable" residents in Ontario who are living on Basic Family Benefits Allowances.

When comparing these "permanently unemployable" recipients to those in the Blind or Oisabled category, the "Disabled" recipients get about one hundred dollars more in their basic monthly allowance. Also, they usually increase this larger monthly allowance automatically, with other allowances for shelter expenses. They are eligible for the GAINS program when they are unable to care for themselves in their normal daily activities. This seems to be the prerequisite for qualifying for the GAINS program

I think that the existing Family Benefits regulations are particularly unfair to the "permanently unemployable" epileptics in the province And since epilepsy may affect 1 percent or 2 percent of the general population, at all social levels, perhaps it is a more significant problem than most people wish to realize

Many of the permanently unemployable epileptics on Family Benefits allowances are capable of taking care of themselves in their daily activities and because of this their basic allowance remains at the welfare level, since they do not qualify for the GAINS (Guaranteed Annual Income Supplement) program.

Medical reasons and social attitudes due to ignorance and prejudice often make epileptics just as unable to find employment which is suitable to their education and ability as the "disabled" I believe it is often necessary to extend the GAINS program to this group Being an epileptic myself, I know they may have severe "grand mal" seizures more often and become much more susceptible to mental illness when their basic allowance remains at or a few dollars above the welfare level for long periods

I think part of the reason for the more frequent convulsions is because the supply or reduced welfare level supply of nutrients to the brain tends to increase the frequency of seizures. Because of this, it seems reasonable to assume that the possibility of more extensive brain damage increases for epileptics as a result of not having a satisfactory living allowance from Family Benefits Anti-convulsant medication, in my opinion, cannot control seizures adequately when living allowances are inadequate

I think that my request is reasonable and sensible because if epileptics have more satisfactory basic living conditions perhaps the percentage of them who become admitted to mental institutions will begin to decline at a saving to the taxpayer in the long run.

Since all the parties in government claim to be free of the ignorance and prejudice attached to some illnesses, at least around election time, they should make an effort to remove the stigmas which are still attached to epilepsy and other diseases.

Prisons turn out angry men

Prisoner Joe Wydryk was one of the organizers of the prisoners' union at Millhaven Penitentiary in Ontario last summer. He was deported to England shortly after he wrote this open letter, in which he explains many of the basic frustrations of prison life and the reasons behind the growing militancy among prisoners in Canadian penal institutions. Excerpts are below.

From the Law Union News for Canadian University Press

So much has already been said - for years, book after book and article after article has painted a depressing picture of our penal institutions. The thrust of these accounts is that our prisons are counter-productive.

Instead of reforming social misfits and fitting them into society, the prisons turn out angry men who often return to both crime and prison.

Penal prisons are made out to be hell holes where individuals are subjected to sexual assault, mental and physical harassment from both guards and fellow prisoners, and where life styles designed to break a man down rather than build him up prevails.

Facts about prisons are grim. Recidivism rates show that 70-80 per cent of all prisoners eventually return to jails after release. Frequent and intense riots inside prisons reveal that prisoners are finding the experience of incarceration more and more intolerable.

Often the nation's newspaper accounts of the prison situation fail to appreciate the impossible task given to penal officials. The job of warden includes protecting the public from so-called dangerous criminals, running an orderly prison that protects prisoners from each other, and if he has time, rehabilitating the prisoners.

There is probably no public institution in North America which so consistently fails to meet its stated goals and which is so great a source of public shame.

While the prisons are called rehabilitative, they have shown themselves to be destructive to individual will and mental health.

Psychiatrist Seymor Holleck has noted: "The prison environment is almost diabolically conceived to force the offender to experience the pangs of what every psychiatrist would describe as mental illness."

Prisons as rehabilitative agencies pose some basic contradictions. If a man's nature is influenced by the company he keeps, as many believe, then the prison will reinforce any criminal values a person carries into prison with him.

Prisons are obviously not the place to meet good company.

Second, if self-respect, self-reliance and individuality are needed to succeed in the outside world, how can a man learn these things in a place where strict discipline and regimentation are enforced to keep the prison going?

Many times the crime that brought the prisoner to jail was a bad decision. How can a man learn to make good decisions in a place where he is allowed to make none?

How many people out there really know what the worst aspect of being in prison is? From the point of view of the prisoners, there is one basic problem. They are locked in, both physically and mentally. The biggest problem is mental.

On the outside, if you run into a hostile person and have an ugly scene with him, you can escape the tension by simply splitting. But in prison with a concentration of people with hostile feelings, there's nowhere to go when tension mounts.

Few people realize how punishing this is. The mental suffering caused by confinement in a hostile arena is much worse than most judges realize when they sentence a man.

The basic feature of mental suffering is being confined amongst hostility with nowhere to go to avoid it.

Some guards are afraid of prisoners and treat them like animals, pull power trips on them. The prisoner gets angry, but is unable to take out his anger on the guard, so ends up running a knife into the side of a fellow prisoner. It's not easy living in that kind of tension.

Some guards know that by keeping the tension amongst prisoners high, they can control them easier, so they spread rumors which create racial divisions.

If the prisoners were ever to cooperate with each other, the guards would be in trouble.

Another source of mental suffering is the fact the prisoner is deprived of heterosexual activity. He is deprived of this release and often begins to doubt his manhood. Homosexuality is very common as a result and many prisoners have difficulty with guilt feelings.

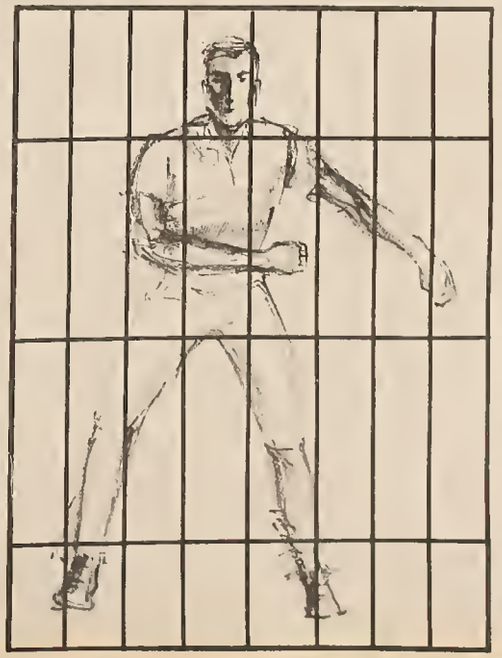
Thirdly, prisoners are deprived of meaningful work and pay for the work they do. At the same time they are deprived of the opportunity to make any meaningful decisions about how to spend their time.

Everything is regulated. Pretty soon they lose self-respect, forget how to make decisions and attempt to prove their manhood through defiance.

By the time a prisoner reaches the streets, he has lost most of the skills required for coping in ordinary society.

Finally there is no way the prisoner can express himself directly about how he feels about his treatment. Every letter he receives or sends is censored. His parole depends on only saying 'good things'. So I think you can see there is a lot of tension, and no escape valves.

The prisoner feels psychologically helpless to do anything about his condition and that's the cause of the greatest suffering. Also, the only serious attempts to improve conditions for the prisoners are brought about by the prisoners themselves.



The administrators view prison as a punishment. They seem really unable to introduce meaningful changes.

Prisons can be concrete and steel symbols for society's more subtle yet ubiquitous psychological prisons of the mind. Any social institution - a school, hospital, factory, office - can fairly be labelled a prison if it seriously restricts a person's freedom, imprisoning him in regulated and routinized modes of behaviour and thought.

We have used and abused children right from grade school to the neglected ones who end up in our training schools, reform schools and then these modern-day big concentration camps.

Because of this abuse and because of their oppressive atmosphere, people should not be surprised when high schools and prisons frequently become the targets of their "inmates" anger and frustration.

When students or prisoners vandalize or destroy the buildings and property around them, they are striking out against the most obvious symbol of their oppression.

To its prisoners, the most important fact about prison is its authoritarian nature. The organizational structure can be described crudely but accurately in terms of sheer power; guards have it and prisoners don't.

Guards may legitimately use a variety of sanctions to control and punish prisoners who disobey orders or engage in prohibited behaviour.

Prisoners may have no similar sanctions they may legitimately use against guards. The grievance forms that are put out for the prisoners' complaints are a complete farce.

In direct confrontations between inmates and guards, the prison administration always relies on the words of the guards.

Because of their relative freedom from regulations, and because the prisoners cannot retaliate, the guards often exercise their power in an arbitrary and capricious manner.

Faced with such unbridled authority most prisoners become tearful of, and eventually submissive to, the whims of the guards. In prison, the guard's word always counts more than the word of the prisoner.

On rare occasions, when prisoners have succeeded in gaining enough attention for their grievances to have a guard reprimanded, indignant colleagues have been known to work to rule, or go on strike, accusing the administration of being "soft on convicts."

symbols of power

Let me try to paint a clearer picture of crude and subtle power. Prisons maintain their authority in part through the use of symbols of power. In prison, these include not only the obvious walls, bars, and towering gun posts, but also the "guard only" rooms and areas off-limits to inmates. For instance, guards have a special toilet right beside the toilet in each working shop.

I remember an old dude who is very aware told me that the reasons a great many lawyers lose cases in the supreme court of Canada is because they get choked up when they see those none white-haired judges sitting way up there on that high bench. The trick, I was told, is to look and address those fascists as if they were down at eye level.

Guards are discouraged from wearing long hair, or having a natural rapport with one of their charges. If a guard in maximum security shows any sign of humanity, if he relates with the prisoners, the older harder line guards set the guard up or just plain make it very hard for the guard to work at ease.

Prison regulations determine what uniform the inmates wear, the length of hair, when they can sleep, get up, eat, wash, go to the toilet, and go outside. Continual surveillance guarantees obedience to these regulations.

Prisons enforce them not only for practical or operational reasons, but also because they promote an atmosphere of unquestioning conformity. Over a period of time, this atmosphere creates an insiduous dependence on the institution. As the prisoners come to rely on regulations to order their daily lives, their self-sufficiency, initiative and individuality gradually erode.

As a result, prisoners released from prison often feel helpless in dealing with the day-to-day problem of ordinary life.

Coal: the hope of an energy-short future

The following thoughts on the energy crisis were submitted by C. Lafkas of the Department of Mining Engineering.

Canada, in 1975 has ceased to be an energy abundant nation and has become energy deficient. The country has now become a net importer of petroleum and is about to take a near vertical plunge into an energy crisis that threatens to put an end to the rapid rise in prosperity of the past and bring an even more rapid decline. And, if not faced immediately and decisively, it can lead to still a worse situation. In fact the crisis is too close to be met effectively and even with the best plans and under the best circumstances large social disruptions and extreme inconvenience to the population cannot be avoided.

Abundant and cheap petroleum, and more recently natural gas, fueled the Canadian economy and the Canadian lifestyle and brought them to their present high level. Petroleum is now beginning to decline. Natural gas is soon to follow the same course. Imported fuel cannot be brought in in the huge quantities that are needed. The country's unfavourable trade position cannot support them. Local sources are not ready to provide enough and the economy is not ready to make use of new types of fuel.

In what follows we shall look into the future supply and demand for the two principal fuels, the possible consequences of their present deficit and the new energy sources that must soon take their place. We shall see how Canada compares with the United States in the severity of the problem.

Canada now has the most energy intensive economy in the world. For each unit of its economic product Canada uses more energy than any other nation; two or three times more than such countries as Germany and France. The reason for this is its concentration in the extraction of natural resources, its climate, the lavish lifestyle of its citizens and their belief that its energy sources are inexhaustible.

Figure I shows the production cycle of conventional oil in Canada. The projected supply has been estimated by the National Energy Board and is the total to be expected from the Alberta basin. This is equal to seven billion barrels of known crude and two billion barrels from expected discoveries, enhanced recovery and natural gas liquids. No 'frontier' oil is included since none of commercial value has been found yet. Extensive exploration and drilling in the Canadian north has revealed no commercial oil (but some gas). Exploration activity at present is at a low level. Oil may still be found, even in large quantities, but it will not arrive soon enough to relieve the crisis which has begun. The country must have moved to another energy source by the time such oil arrives.

The time needed for finding the necessary additional quantities and for pipeline research and construction may be of the order of 15 to 20 years. By then of course Canadian needs will have more than doubled. A part of Canada's gas supply was committed for sale to the United States at a time when Canada was believed to have centuries' worth of oil and gas. The remainder of this committed gas is about 12 trillion cubic feet, equal to two years' supply of oil and gas energy for Canada at the present rate of use. Since the revenue from the sale of this gas may be used to buy the equivalent oil abroad, for which Canada now has a greater need, there is little to be gained by breaking these contracts, an act that would greatly anger the Americans since certain areas of their country depend critically on it.

What would be the consequences of the large fuel deficit in the coldest country on each? There are many possible scenarios with much in common. Let us look at some of these. A drop in the standard of living to begin with. Canada had high unemployment when its economy had an abundance of cheap fuel and could expand without obstacles. The shortage of fuel can only reduce activity and employment. And what about social peace? Would the hardships bring Canadians together or set them against each other? And when the prospects for improvement from economic expansion, that keep the majority of the population hopeful and patient, disappear where else could they turn their attention but to the income of the rich? The inevitable social strife would keep government too busy with day to day problems to think of the solutions that are necessarily long term.

An important question begs an answer here: how much energy can an economy lose and still keep going? Many studies have shown that economic output is roughly proportional to energy used. But nobody knows what happens when a given economy loses a large part of its energy for an extended period. Economies are complex non-linear systems and their behaviour under large changes in their inputs cannot be predicted.

It should be noted here that the much publicized energy crisis of the United States will not be as severe as Canada's in the coming years. It is conceivable that Canada will not act soon enough to avert its own crisis and the country will be in a worse position than the United States. Calls will be made in Canada to revive the Continental Energy Plan which was rejected in the past in the belief that it was a scheme by the United States to deprive Canada of its energy resources. The USA does have a great need for other resources, especially minerals, which it cannot meet from within its own territory. In exchange for these resources it could reduce its own fuel consumption by a small amount and meet Canada's minimum needs.

The Americans have had an energy deficit for years but it is growing slowly relative to the projected Canadian deficit. Their supply declines more slowly than the projected Canadian supply as well. If the present trends continue the Canadian deficit will become relatively larger than the American by 1980. In Figure 7 the oil production cycles for the two countries are plotted together. The USA will be producing oil long after Canada's oil is gone. On a relative basis, with regard to reserves and population, Canada is extracting its oil at twice the American rate. However, Canada's dependence on oil as a fuel is much larger than the USA's.

The USA's energy prospects are much brighter than Canada's. Canadians think they are energy abundant while Americans know they have a problem. The USA's oil will last longer, their deficit will be smaller, their coal industry is well established and can be expanded easily, they have undertaken large research projects to meet the problem, and they have warm parts in their country where they could relocate industry and population if that is needed. Further, they have large influence abroad and military power to protect or even obtain foreign fuel if that becomes necessary.

Canada's fuel deficit which is to appear in 1976 will grow too rapidly to be met by new sources and Canada's international trade position is too unfavourable to allow adequate fuel imports. Conservation therefore is inevitable, whether planned or forced.

How much can be saved? The Americans in their Project Independence Report state that a 15 percent reduction in use can be achieved. Beyond that economic disruption begins. From Figure 3 it may be seen that a 15 percent reduction in demand would shift the curve to the right by two years and would postpone the crisis by that amount of time. Larger savings are needed to allow time to bring in new sources. Conservation in this case means reduction in oil consumption above all, and then in natural gas. The saving must be permanent, since the present level of consumption of oil and gas is not likely to be reached or approached again.

Industry offers comparatively few possibilities for overall energy savings. As a rule it does things more rationally and engineers have always been on the lookout for savings. However substitution of coal for oil and gas for the provision of process heat and other needs could save those fuels. But coal at the moment is not available. A large overall reduction of energy use by industry would cause shutdowns and unemployment. Energy use in industry must inevitably increase greatly in the near future: The highly energy intensive mineral and forest industries that are now using about percent of the country's energy are only ones that can be expanded provide secure exports. This would make it possible to pay for the inevitable imports, among other things.

The residential and commercial sectors offer good promise for saving Forty percent of all energy, 24 percent of the oil and 50 percent of the gas is used here. There are a number of steps that can be taken: thermostats can be lowered, unused rooms can be shut off, builders can be allowed to cool when not in use, insulation can be improved, building codes can be changed, and wood and coal can be used as fuel in areas away from large city centers. Waste heat from thermal power stations that are located in cities can be used. Toronto has large quantities of such heat. In the long run cities will have to be redesigned if they are to be heated efficiently by district heating plants. A much higher population density than at present will be needed. The present low density suburban areas will have to be abandoned. Such areas have the additional disadvantage of being unsuited for service by mass transport. Steel and glass buildings also pose problems and should no longer be built.

The private car offers the greatest promise for oil savings. It consumes percent of all oil and over 15 percent of energy. It might be thought that going small cars and driving less would be the answer, just as in Europe. However that is no solution in the short run. It takes years of production to replace all the cars on the road and such time is not available. A faster and greater reduction will be needed. This could be achieved by higher prices for gasoline or rationing (or a combination of the two). The present average of 2 gallons per day could be reduced to 2 or 3 gallons a week with unlimited additional quantities available at, say $4 to $7 a gallon. Simultaneously mass transport networks could be established relatively quickly. The car industry could switch to bus making. A more buses could be purchased abroad. Regarding the long term survival of the private car the prospects are favourable. With much higher population densities in the cities of the future, there may not be room for it, even if there is no fuel problem (the electric car may have been perfected by then). In the meantime if most people can no longer use their cars and must give them up would they consider it a provocative display of wealth and nuisance if a minority continued using theirs?

Fuel can also be saved by switching intercity truck freight to trains which should be electrified where track is used heavily.

Conservation painful

Conservation in the amounts implied here would cause disruptions. But it could help avert worse things. The biggest obstacle to conservation will be public resistance. People are not convinced that all these unpleasant measures are needed. It may take much time and distress to create a climate in which these measures will become widely desirable. Unfortunately the available time is so short that heavy damage may be inevitable.

Canada is well endowed with a variety of energy sources other than conventional oil and gas and even for these, large deposits may some day be found in the Arctic or in the East, in land or sea. The large area of the country and the small population should ensure that on a per capita basis there should be plenty. There is no excuse for an energy crisis in Canada. The country will become the laughing stock of the world if it allows itself to drift into one. The problem of course is time: the time needed to develop the sources and to convert the large energy consuming economy of Canada so it can use other types of energy. This conversion problem will soon be faced by every country that uses oil on a large scale. Canada is only the first country that must do it in great haste.

There is no known technology for utilizing solar energy on a large scale and none is likely to be developed in the next 20 to 40 years. It may be used as an auxiliary source for space heating. It could provide as much as 5 percent to 10 percent to Canada's total energy and possibly more. However the capital cost is too high at more than $1000 per annual ton of coal equivalent. Using coal instead would cost about $100 to $150. Therefore in the coming rush to change over from oil it would be a wrong step to concentrate on solar power since it would divert capital from more promising directions.

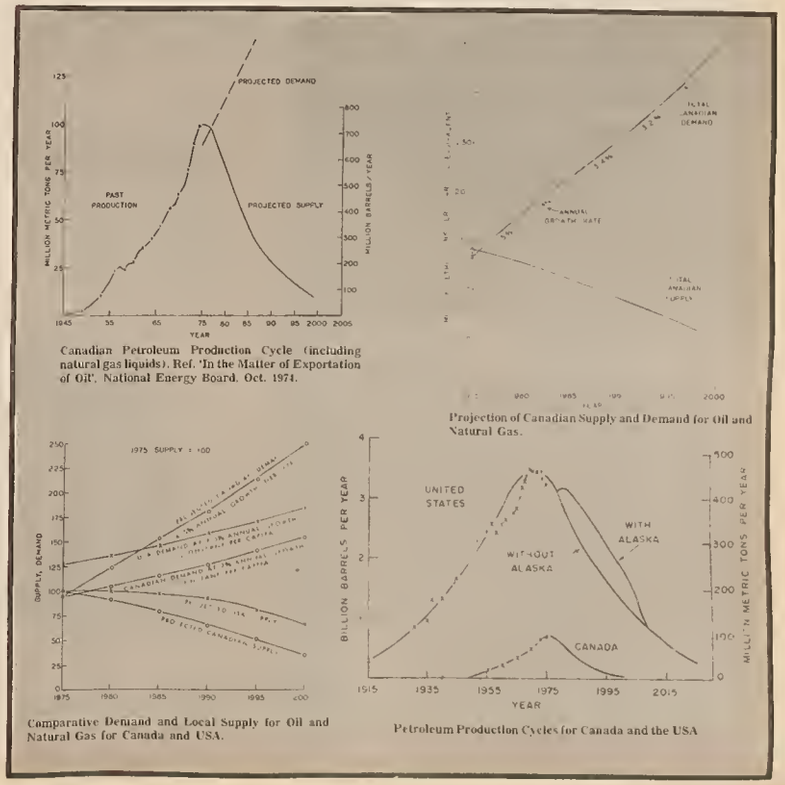
The potential electricity available from wind in Canada is of the order of 10,000 billion kilowatt hours a year or thirty times Canada's present electrical output. This energy is mostly in the north, it has low reliability, the technology is not well developed and capital cost is high. It may be used profitably in isolated communities and farms and could supply up to 1 percent of Canada's total energy needs in the near future. It has promise for the distant future but is no answer to today's problem.

It is sometimes stated that garbage could make a significant contribution to Canada's energy supply. There are 20 million tons of garbage per year in Canada. About half of this could be collected in the large centres and burnt in large ineinerators. This quantity would provide 1 percent of Canada's primary energy needs. The capital requirements would be very high. Garbage of course has more value for things it contains that could be reclaimed.

Complete development of Canada's hydro potential would more than double present installed capacity. But it would contribute little to the solution of the main problem and is very highly capital intensive. It should be developed if the capital can be spared which is unlikely in the next 10 to 20 years.

The known uranium reserves of Canada, 190,000 metric tons if used in Canada reactors at 1 percent burnup and 20 percent efficiency would supply all of Canada's present electric needs for 40 years and its total secondary energy needs for six years, assuming it were possible to use electricity everywhere. The ultimate uranium reserves of Canada can only be estimated by general methods, by considerations of crustal abundance. If uranium were prospected as thoroughly as copper and zinc, 2 million tons might be found in Canada. This would be enough for 400 years of Canada's total energy needs (or for 28 years at 5 percent annual growth). There is of course thorium which can also be used in nuclear reactors. It should be more plentiful than uranium but the technology for its use has not been developed. There are also large deposits of very low grade uranium of 100 parts per million or less and some deposits with more. It was thought that this uranium could be used and provide energy for centuries but it is necessary to grind the rock in which it is contained and use an expensive method of ion exchange to recover the pure uranium.

Research is currently underway in the USA to determine the actual energy costs of these processes. In the meantime these low grade ores cannot be considered as reserves as was the practice some years ago. Much of the hope of the world for plentiful nuclear power rested on these low grade deposits and on ordinary nuclear reactors. Breeder reactors of course would indeed use these ores since they use the low grade uranium. For breeders fuel supplies would last for thousands of years and probably longer. However, the technology of breeders is not well developed. There are three now operating (UK, France, USSR) but it will be about 20 years before they are commercial, if ever.



Attitudes must change

We hear often that in the future electricity will provide a larger part of our energy, perhaps even all of it. Nuclear energy would make this possible. Electricity is the most luxurious and expensive form of energy. For every unit of electricity that is consumed three units of fuel are used to make it, with a lot of expensive equipment. Canada now has 60 million installed kilowatts producing 14 per cent of its energy. In the USA it is 10 per cent, elsewhere less. If Canada went all electric today the required installed capacity would have to go up to 600 or 700 million kilowatts. Space heating alone would need 250 million kilowatts. An all electric USA would need 6,000 million kilowatts while an all electric world would need 20,000 million kilowatts. These absurd numbers should help place electricity in the proper perspective. Electricity should be used only where it is without substitute: in lighting and in driving electric motors and other electrical equipment. Many great electrical generating projects are under construction today in Canda and still greater numbers are in planning, presumably as a response to the energy crisis. While making only a small contribution to the main problem these projects swallow up colossal amounts of capital.

Coal is the complete and only solution to Canada's energy problem. According to the Geologic Survey of Canada, the country's known resources of coal are 110 billion metric tons and the prospects are very favourable for greater quantities to be found in the western provinces, the Yukon and the North West Territories Estimates by the U.S. Geological Survey have given Canada's ultimate mineable coal reserves as 600 billion tons.

The recoverable part of the known resources is 45 billion metric tons. This could provide cheap energy for Canada for 200 years at the present rate of use of fossil fuels. The expected additional discoveries could provide even more Coal will allow Canada's industry and agriculture to expand and make full use of the country's renewable resources and more thorough use of the non-renewable It would also provide time to realize the full potential of conservation and achieve the highest possible efficiency of energy use.

The conversion to coal affects more than mining and transportation. Many changes must be made at the user end Machines, ways of doing things and even psychology must change to adapt to the new fuel, and to the profound changes it will bring to the country's lifestyle. Coal is more polluting than oil and gas. It cannot be burned the same way. Pollution control will be one of the major problems. But people's attitude towards it will change Coal will no longer be regarded as the dirty fuel but will be recognized for what it is, the guardian from grimmer things, the lifegiver With this in mind, coal smoke will be accepted, indeed welcome, as the sign of prosperity and security and will have a finer aroma than the most expensive perfume

Lynn Atkinson

The concert of the Queen's Improvisational Group revealed that right in our midst is new and vital talent. The programme consisted of all twentieth century music, from Debussy to student compositions. A lot of the works were a mixture of the traditional (pre-1850) and the more modern, almost as if the composers were torn between the two.

The influence of 18th century harmony, atonality, and jazz could be heard in the music of Dan McConnachie, of which the "Brass Quintet" and the "Introduction and Allegro for clarinet and bassoon" were performed. Both works were executed extremely well; the moods being set and maintained in every movement. The "Brass Quintet" is an unusual piece of work because of the way it takes great advantage of the tuba's ability.

Poetry was very well dramatized at four different points in the programme. The verse of various modern poets had been put together in an interesting medley, however, parts of the presentation were rather futile, as some of the material was impossible to make sense of in only one hearing.

Two of the musical works involved movement of the players. In the first, a trombonist, a flautist, a clarinetist, and a French horn player each came out of a different corner of the room playing what was apparently improvised from a pre-arranged basis. The sounds they produced were quite pleasing. The next was a quintet of double basses. Each bass player walked out in turn, picked up his instrument, and began to bow not a note, but a noise. Once they were all playing, they began bowing pitches on random strings. They then played pizzicato, and returned to the original noise. They finished by leaving the same way they had entered. The whole thing was rather boring, and not at all musical.

Three vocal pieces on the programme were written by Frode Nilson. The first was "In the Wood of Albert", a love song for voice, guitar, violin, cello, and flute. The verse had a beautiful melody, and the accompaniment was almost an entity. The second, entitled "Memories", for guitar and voice, was in the style of a folk song. The third, "Variations on Three Contemporary English Folksongs" was scored for cello, harpsichord, and voice.

One of the best parts of the programme was Mary Jane Wass's superbly lyrical rendition of the "Romanza from Piano Sonata No. I" by Doug Atkinson. This is an excerpt which could be even better appreciated in context with the other movements, and it is to be hoped that the sonata can be performed complete in the near future.

One piece of electronic music was performed (on tape). It was a worthwhile composition entitled "Phase II", by Blaine Workman. Although some electronic music seems to lack rhythm, this work was quite "musical".

The programme closed with a piano duet composed by Prof. Crawley, the organizer of the group, when he was a student. It was a setting of French nursery songs, using some polytonality, some atonality, and traditional harmony. The performers obviously enjoyed playing it, which is one of the nicest things to see at a concert.

Hyland theatre

A Flash in the pan

Sandra Bernstein

Royal Flash, Richard Lester's latest movie, is currently playing at the Hyland theatre. It affects me as Chinese food does some people, in that I was amused by it while in the theatre, but felt very dissatisfied with it as soon as I left.

A comedy, Royal Flash is based on one of the books in the Flashman series by cult hero George MacDonald Fraser. Fraser began by writing the memoirs of a minor figure from Tom Brown's Schooldays, and passing them off as the authentic work of a nineteenth-century gentleman. A local Flashman enthusiast tells me that at first Fraser's Pale Fire style of documentation fooled even the New York Times book reviewer, but Flashman soon passed into the realms of legend, like Casanova & Co.

At any rate, the source, being a fictional story set among greats of history, concerning a "man of the sword," places this film very close to Lester's other recent efforts, namely The Three Musketeers and The Four Musketeers. Although this movie contains many elements of the bizarre and probably an undercurrent of male homosexual in-jokes, because of its heavy reliance on comic swordplay and the flamboyance of its sets, costumes and camera movement, it seems less a development in Lester's career than a redundance.

Without having read the books, one suspects too that the spirit of the original may have been lost. Malcolm MacDowell's Flashman is an ungallant Cockney from an English private school; and if Lester portrays Bismarck and others in completely unhistorical ways it is to be outrageous, but the Flashman characterization seems intended to make him sort of lovable everyman. One tires, too, of Lester's voracious females, painted with just a dab of misogyny.

Parts of the film simply drag only to be redemmed by a hilarious line of sight gag. Some of the humour is Pythonesque, as when Flashman complains that he has been kidnapped and forced to wear a monocle.

At other points, the comedy makes us slightly uneasy, perhaps because Lester has incorporated in it a surreal element. Funny though the liberal use of phallic symbols may be (there is even a duel with sausages) it becomes evident through the film that Flashman's enemies are not out for his life but for his, er, manhood. The male enemies are after him with blades, and the women are trying to exhaust him.

Castration complexes asides, however, Royal Flash does have its moments, and is a fairly amusing, if modest, effort. Lester's characters have the mobility and adventures we meet only in our dreams, and his taste for the bizarre gives us some marvelous flights of fancy, such as a Bismarck whose hobby is taxidermy. Perhaps an undemanding Lester romp is what many need around exam time.

Good luck boy

Cynthia David

Raffi is a warm, friendly, wonderfully funny person. There he stood in stockinged feet, guitar in hand, ready to create a delightful evening, the last we will enjoy at Bitter Grounds this year.

In a clear rich voice, the Toronto-based folk artist sang lonely tunes that reached out to touch the soul, songs about lost love, being a musician, memories of childhood and friends. But most of Raffi's music is a celebration of life, as in "Feel like a Million" and "Good Luck Boy" with its ragtime beat.

His style cannot be neatly placed in a box. The poster promised 'Armenian off-white blues' but, while he is of Armenian descent, capturing his far-away homeland in the instrumental impressions, the closest he came to a blues number was "that old familiar what a drag it is to fake it how much longer can I take it Blooze". Raffi combines folk, 'country and eastern' music and anti-blues ("Verging on oranges") with a liberal sprinkling of philosophy and wit, mixed with a trace of satire. Besides a wealth of original material, he performed songs by David Bradstreet, Peter Mathieson, and Joan Baez.

Raffi's first album Good Luck Boy is an impressive collection which becomes more meaningful each time you listen to it. I would highly recommend it to anyone looking for some great music.

Although much of Raffi's music is light and straight-forward, one realizes that amidst the fun and laughter, the singer is bringing us a message about a harsh world of reality, a world easily forgotten and far removed from our own secure existence. Listen carefully to the words of "Play 'Melancholy Baby' Sweetheart" and "Thinking only of you" (both from his album) to discover the depth in Raffi's music.

Here is a man, thankful for the good life he has led and the opportunity to fulfill many of his dreams, who enjoys sharing his music and friendship with everyone he meets.

Messiah is coming

The Chalmers Singers are going to repeat their complete performance of George Friderick Handel's great oratorio, Messiah in the spring of Kingston's Tercentennial year, 1973, they filled St. Mary's Cathedral to standing-room-only capacity, and many more would-be listeners had to be turned away. Again this year they will sing the oratorio in St. Mary's, on the evening of Friday, December 12.

The soloists for this performance will include two Ottawa singers, tenor David Galbraith and contralto Doris Parker.

Local audiences have heard Mrs. Parker as a soloist with the Kingston Choral Society and in the Chalmers Singers' 1973 performance of "Messiah. Soprano solos will be sung by Audrey Farnell who has sung in Kingston at Chalmers Church and at Queen's University, and she is teaching some Kingston voice students on a commuting basis. Florida-born Randall Marsh, baritone, is the best-known of the four to Kingston audiences, both as a concert singer and as the teacher of many other local singers, as private students and at Queen's.

The performance will be conducted by David Cameron, Director of Music at Chalmers Church, conductor of the Pro Arte Singers, and an instructor at Queen's music department and the Theological College Mr. Cameron has directed the Chalmers Singers since 1966. The performance of Handel's Messiah will also be heard by audiences in Brockville and Belleville.

Discussing his approach to Handel's music, David Cameron explains that it is specialized in some ways. "We want to get back to something like Handel's basic intentions", he says. "Very often his music is performed by choirs of a hundred singers or more, with very large orchestras, but we know that this isn't how he worked himself. Clarity and vitality, with improvised ornaments adding sparkle, were much more important than sheer massiveness of sound for eighteenth-century musicians".

The orchestra will consist of the Camerata, a group of string players formed last year by Queen's music professor David Keane, with the addition of woodwinds, trumpets, timpani, organ and harpsichord. Of the Camerata, Mr Cameron says: "they are exactly right for eighteenth century music - a well-balanced small group of really excellent musicians who are used to playing together". Although eighteenth-century performing practices will generally be followed, the conductor insists that he doesn't want "Messiah" to be turned into a musical museum piece. "Our main goal is to give a really expressive performance of Handel's masterpiece, to let the audience share fully in its beauty, its poignancy, and its excitement. Everything that we do as performers is intended to support that one main purpose".

The performance of Handel's Messiah will be in St. Mary's Cathedral, Johnson and Clergy Streets, at 8:00 P.M. on Friday, December 12. Admission, including a programme with the complete text, is $2.50, and tickets are available from the Chalmers Church office at 212 Barrie Street.

Leggs do it again!

Over the past weekend the Synchronized Swimming team, consisting of Diane Edgerly, Jeannie Hughes, Celeste Jennings, Kathy Lammers, Sandy Landell, Carol McBurney, Laurie Morrison, Elaine Prosenjak, Karen Russell, Jan Schultze, Carol Short and Judi Spence, travelled to McGill University for the Eastern Semi-Final Sectionals against McGill, McMaster and U. of T. Apparent was the overall improvement in calibre from previous years with Queen's providing several excellent performances to win first place at the meet.

Friday night, soloists Laurie Morrison and Diane Edgerly swept first and second place with 72.6 and 70.3 points consecutively, ahead of strong soloist Celine Valors of McGill finishing with 69.0 points. The girls' unique routines were composed and executed to provide very strong performances and certainly were the highlight of the solos competition.

Queen's continued it's streak in the duet competition, winning with 69.3 points (five points ahead of McGill) with Celest Jennings and Karen Russell showing an impressive display of synchronization. Kathy Lammers and Elaine Prosenjak placed 4th with a surprising performance considering their small amount of practice, and were able to display a fine demonstration of talent.

Early Saturday morning in the figures competition the 'Golden Leggs' Laurie Morrison 31.6 points, Celest Jennings 31.2 points, Diane Edgerly 31.1 points and Karen Russell with 30.0 points took the top four places.

Finally the 8 man team consisting of Jennie Hughes, Kathy Lammers, Sandy Landell, Carol McBurney, Elaine Prosenjak, Carol Short and Judi Spence put on their best performance with Judi and Jennnie all teeth leading the team to a 2nd place finish, three points behind McMaster University.

Much credit and thanks goes to Coach Madeline Pavelka assisted by Marion Caswell-Pitters and last but certainly not least, manager Nayda Cole who was always ready to adjust accoustics, add moral support and hand out nose plugs!!

Good luck in January Golden Leggs, when they go to the next meet. Overall results:

Queen's 56 points
McGill 29 points
McMaster 28 points
U. of T. 14 points

Badminton Gals take tournament

by Di Edwards

This weekend the Queen's women's intercollegiate badminton team hosted the Part I East badminton tournament which included teams from Ryerson, Toronto, Ottawa and Queen's. True to form, Queen's was victorious, accumulating 24 out of a possible 27 wins. Toronto came a close second with 21 points, while Ryerson and Ottawa were completely out of the picture with only 8 and 2 wins respectively.

Queen's had 3 undefeated players in both their singles and doubles events. Fifty singles player Sandy McFarlene played her best badminton so far this year and managed to trounce all her singles opposition. Sixth singles Bev Koski was also in excellent form on Saturday and was victorious in all her 3 singles matches. McFarlene and Koski teamed to form a dynamic 3rd double team which, with a lot of smashing and teamwork, defeated all of their opposition to each emerge with a 6 wins, 0 losses record. The third undefeated star of the tourney was 4th singles Betsy Carey. There was no doubt that Carey would have any problem in either her singles or her doubles matches since she was on form front the word go. Carey's 2nd doubles team partner, Sandy Kouner certainly turned out to be the most amazing player of the tournament. This 3rd singles player lost only one match during the day, unfortunately to Toronto, because of an injury. After returning from the hospital, resting up during the noon hour break, Koerner somewhat spryly hopped back onto the court, tape and all, and swept through all her double matches victoriously - a special congratulations to her

Another Golden Gal who was successful in all her singles matches was 2nd singles player Di Edwards who decided to try and match the rest of the team's extensive record of victories. Teamed with 1st singles player Daphne Meredith Edwards only lost one game in doubles once again to that ever present foe, Toronto, after a very long and gruelling showdown. Although Edwards and Meredith were in the best form they had been in for a long time, their numerous drops, smashes and drives did not quite manage to match their opposition's abilities.

In addition to having a drawn out 3 game doubles match with Toronto, Meredith came up against exactly the same situation in singles. She eventually conceded to Toronto's first singlesplayer, after a very long, but exciting game.

As of present standings, Queen's is leading the East division by 8 points followed closely by Toronto. Results from the West division, which also played this past weekend are not known yet, but it is hoped that Queen's is still the top of the 11 participating schools. After Christmas these schools are divided into an upper and lower flights on the basis of the total number of matches won in singles and doubles. The teams within each flight play one another so this means Queen's will probably get two more attempts to trounce Toronto and Western. With any luck, Queen's will come back stronger than ever after the well-deserved Christmas break

Queen's entered another Badminton Tournament Sunday, from which four men and four women were chosen to represent Central Ontario in the Winter Games. Of these eight players from various clubs and universities in competition Sunday, Queen's was fortunate in having three of our students chosen to play in the Winter Games.

Daphne Meredith qualified to enter the singles; Daphne Meredith and Dianne Edwards qualified to enter in the doubles; and Bernie Houghton has qualified to go in the men's doubles. Also, Barb Carey, an ex-Queen's student now attending U. of Toronto, qualified to enter the singles. The two other Queen's contestants in the tournament also did extremely well but did not qualify to enter the Winter Games; they were Sandy Koerner and Gail Raycraft.

Di Edwards was successful in all of her singles matches. Along with Daphne Meredith they lost to only one team—our rival U. of T.

V-Ball Gals Number 1 in East

The Queen's volleyball Gals put together a valiant team effort this past weekend, defeating all opposition in the Eastern Sectional I tournament held in Toronto at York University. Game scores were as follows:

Queen's vs. Laurentian	15-7, 15-3
Queen's vs. Carleton	15-3, 15-1
Queen's vs. Toronto	15-5, 15-9
Queen's vs. York	15-11, 14-16, 15-11

This places the Gals in the top position in Eastern Ontario. Coach Donna Gallagher was very pleased with her team's excellent performance, attributing their success to the team giving 100 per cent effort in each game, and pulling together as a team. The calibre of the Queen's team was seen to be at a higher level than that of the other universities taking part. Queen's real competition will be when they face teams from the Western section, but this will not be until after the Eastern Sectional II tournament, which is held in February.

Pool Gaels split

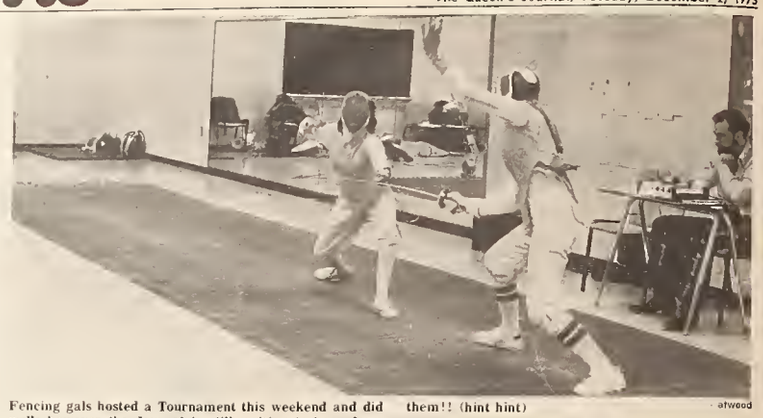
John Ireland

The spectators at the Queen's-York Dual Meet Friday could hardly have been thrilled as the Queen's aquatic squad destroyed a rather ineffectual York team, taking first and second place in virtually every event. Mention must be made however of Tim Dennis' three firsts and two well paced 500 yd. freestyle swims by Schnittker and Cassidy. Freestyle Leo Hwozdyk also had a night to remember, blasting out a 24.0 personal best for the 50 yd freestyle and equalling his best ever 100 free time in the opening leg of the freestyle relay, with a highly respectable 53.8. Veteran John Pearson also produced a fine swim in the 200 fly, showing endurance and perfect pacing to match his speed in a good 2:08.4, as he dead-heated with team-mate John Ireland.

If the team could afford to coast a little Friday, Saturday was to prove very different. The Grim Reaper in the form of academic commitment took a heavy toll, reducing from the ranks John Schneidermann, skipper Wayne Serebrin and rookie star Tim Dennis. These absences proved costly as the Gaels went against a star-studded Ottawa team, featuring top national swimmer, Ken Ekstrand and Olympic veteran Bill Kennedy. The result was a one-sided 63-32 victory for Ottawa. Whilst one is tempted to dwell on what might have been, a) had the Gaels fielded a full team, and b) had the divers been allowed to participate, the shock therapy should prove useful in reminding the Gaels that there are tougher meets to come after the Christmas break.

There were however several noteworthy performances. Roger 'Tex' Cassidy swam a nicely paced 1000 freestyle to win that event as team-mate Alex Muir took third. In the 50 yd. freestyle John Pearson cranked out a fine 23.7 to close in on that team record, placing second and followed closely by Leo Hwozdyk who took third. In the 200 I.M. the Gaels got a temporary lift as Bruce Ripley and Drew Fagan took first and second with respectable times. The next event, the 200 fly saw captain John Ireland on the losing end of a tough duel with Olympian Bill Kennedy. Neck and neck on the last turn, it was Kennedy by half a second, although Ireland was pulled to equalling his best time ever with a 2:05.7.

Despite a second place finish by Bruce Ripley in the 200 backstroke, Ottawa took command at this point to extinguish any hopes of a Queen's come-back. The gaels are determined nonetheless that the meet will be a lot closer next time. The team's immediate objective however is to stay in shape over Christmas as further meets start again early in the New Year



Swim Gals triumph

Last Friday night, the Swimming Gals took part in the first of two cold meets held over the weekend. York University provided the opposition, and despite a somewhat smaller than usual team, Queen's was victorious. The Gals picked up where they left off two weeks ago as more team records fell. Cathy Bruce did a lifetime best in the 200 breaststroke, as she took another second off her previous record of 2:48.7 set in the last meet. In the 200 fly, Kate Whitaker also posted a new record. Queen's efforts were also helped by diver Mary Lou Fasken, who competed on the one metre board.

On Saturday, the Queen's Swimming Gals journeyed to Ottawa with the men's team to compete in a tie-meet with York and the University of Ottawa. The important competition for Queen's was against Ottawa since they had already taken York the night before. Again the Queen's contingent was small, but the Gals beat the Ottawa women. However, overall, Ottawa came out on top. More team records a well as personal bests were set.

In the 200 freestyle, Cindy Whitley took five seconds off her initial attempt of the night before and recorded a personal best of 2:37.4. In the 100 fly, Kate Whitaker lowered her own record to 1:06.4, and in the 100 freestyle, Cathy Brace set another team record with a time of 0:59.5.

A victory with such a small number clearly demonstrates the depth and versatility of the team, as Queen's again filled virtually every event. The Gals are off now until after Christmas, when they will start into a fairly full schedule of meets leading up to the OWIAA finals.

Fencing gals hosted a Tournament this weekend and did them!! (hint hint) well; however the Journal is still waiting to hear from

Wrestling Gaels in Ryerson open

Z. Scarelli

In only four years, the Ryerson Open has become established as one of the toughest and certainly the first major tournament of each new wrestling season. Over 400 matches were contested on Saturday with many Canadian champions and several past and present American world class wrestlers dominating the championships. Mike Dwhytie finished in 4th spot in a field of 19 wrestlers at 167 lbs., behind the current Canadian and Ameriean champions.

The overall performance of the Queen's wrestlers was much improved over the previous week, considering the mueh tougher calibre of eompetition. Al Stewart and Kevin McAllister won their first matches of the young season and rookies Ron Craddock and Tim Wardrop wrestled well

Andy Christie of Queen's B-Ball Gaels drives in for two points. Gaels defeated Cambrian College 75-54 on Saturday.

B-Ball Gaels win; play Ottawa tonight

Alps Boniwell

The few tens of people who showed up in Bews gym on Saturday to watch the Gaels get back on the winning track, 75-54 over Cambrian must have wondered if they were the victims of someones' well-planned prank. All the advertising posters said the Queen's Golden Gaels were playing Cambrian College at 2:00 pm but surely that wasn't the Gaels that played the first half. Could some joker in search of election posters to deface have settled on basketball signs and it was really the Nursing Science 57 basketball team that was playing Cambrian, for after all the score at half-time was 32-20 in Cambrian's favour, admittedly a pathetic total even for a bunch of 40 year old nurses but unheard of for a university basketball team. However, safe with the knowledge that the second half was a complete reversal of the first we'll assume, for everyone's benefit, that in fact that wasn't the Gaels who played the first 20 minutes.

Starting then with a defieit of 12 points the Gaels eame out in the second half with a hustling man to man defense which limited Cambrian to only 22 points for the remainder of the game and set the tempo of the game to where Queen's likes it - fast.

However, more importantly the Gaels finally looked in time with this quick tempo, something they haven't really done all year. Of course the key to this is running a fast-break, and running it well. Queen's has tried to fast-break in all their games but it was never particularly noticable either to the spectators or the opposition. On Saturday however, all those attempts finally started to pay off as the fast-break swept the Gaels past Cambrian within 5 minutes of the second half and onto victory. It would be a gross understatement to say the fast-break still has a lot of rough edges but as long as continued improvement is visible there's no reason to believe they won't be smoothed out. Hopefully by tonight at 8:15 when the Gaels go against the Ottawa Gee-Gees they'll have dulled one painfully sharp edge, the one that saw them miss 15 lay-ups against Cambrian. If they do even that much for tonight's contest, Queen's could finally start to live up to their pre-season notices.

On Saturday high seores were Derek Swinnard with 17 points and Steve McCredy with 13 with Dave Lockhart pulling down 10 rebounds.

Mustangs gallop over Gaels

It's difficult to say anything good about the way the Gaels played on the weekend. Both Friday night and Saturday they played flatly and were eonsistently out-hustled. As a result they lost 5-2 to Western Friday night and 8-4 to McMaster in an exhibition game Saturday afternoon.

The Western Mustangs were sky-high when they came out of the dressing room while the Gaels were sleeping. As a result Western scored its first goal with only 44 seconds gone in the first period. They took a 2-0 lead on a goal by Steve Gelinas. Western had no stars, no standouts, just seventeen guys who never let up. They skated and ehecked as if it took no effort at all. Due to the persistent forechecking, Queen's beeame extremely disorganized in their own end and gave up the puck far too many times. Before the period was over, Haramis was set up beautifully by Dougie Grills to margin to 2-1 with three minutes to go in the first. Western eame on strong however and Gelinas got his second of the night at 18:50 to give Western a 3-1 lead to take to the dressing room.

The Gaels needed to eome out big in the second and while they got a lot of shots on net, they could put none behind Western goal tender Cam Fink. Western continued to out-skate the Gaels and scored late in the seeond to take a 4-1 lead.

In the third, Sandles gave Queen's fans some hope he scored with a booming slapshot at 2:33. Western had been quicker, scoring 50 seeonds earlier than that. The score was 5-2 at that point and it was not to change.

The Gaels appeared mixed up all night and could not move the puck out of their own end at all. Western, on the other hand, had a system and stuck to it. They passed beautifully, and finished off their plays nicely. The main thing that the Gaels laek is a system for getting the puek out of their end. Rapping it up the boards will never work against good checking teams like Western. We simply have to start moving the puck competently in our end.

This happened too often.....

.....and this didn't happen enough. (Queen's lost it's first league game this weekend)

Two Queen's players stood out Friday. Tim Hanson, who came here from Laurentian this year, must have skated three miles. While he wan't in on any of the scoring plays, he hustled more than did anyone else on the ice and did some excellent digging in the corners. The other player worhty of inention was Clyde Harris who made some incredible saves. For my money, Harris must be All-Canadian this year.

Saturday McMaster came in to Joek Harty for an exhibition game. Mae dressed only thirteen players and somehow managed to outhustle us. They are a well-conditioned team who never let up for a second in sixty minutes of play. They passed well and got great goal tending from Tom Wynne. The Gaels looked tired and found themselves down 2-1 at the end of the first, 5-1 at the end of the second and 8-4 at the end of the game. Queen's goals came from Ned McIntyre, Bill White, Kevin Treacy and a beauty by Doug Sandles. For Mae, goals eame from McCrory, Smith, Wilson got a pair, Silmser and a hat-trick by Wayne Dusome.

The Gaels have two big ones next weekend against York. Unfortunately, these games have to be played at RMC. Buses will be provided for fans who want to see the games and will leave from in front of the Phys Ed. Centre at 7:15pm Friday night and at 1:15 pm. Saturday. Win, lose or draw, the Gaels are worth watching and I'm calling for them to beat York twice next weekend. They're big games for both teams and some great hoekey can be seen Friday and Saturday.

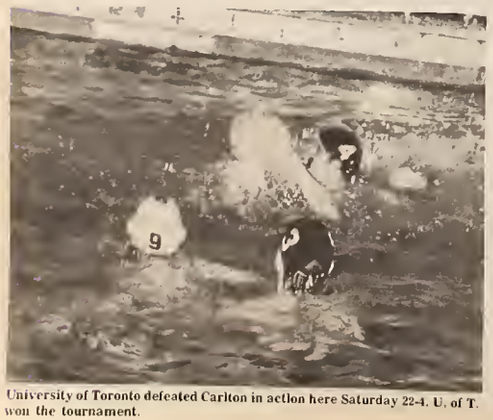
W-Polo Gaels 2nd to TO. in East go to OUAA finals December 6

Queen's Waterpolo Gaels finished second, behind U. of Toronto, in the OUAA East Division as the final waterpolo tournament came to a spectacular close Saturday evening at the Queen's pool.

The Gaels started the tournament with a victory over RMC, 7-6 and continued to play strong waterpolo throughout the afternoon. Queen's defeated York University 20-2 and then Carleton University bowed to Queen's 20-7. Queen's final game was played against U. of Toronto and Queen's lost by a score of 7-6. It was a close game that swayed back and forth in favour of both sides, but when the final whistle blew, Toronto had the edge.

High scorer for Queen's was Peter Trebuss with 15 goals Dave Ardell scored 9 goals, Bob Brisebois netted 8 goals, Paul Nolan and Craig Render each scored 6 times, Bruce Hopkins and Chris Whately each scored 3 goals, and Mike Fox and Gord Houston each scored one goal.

The overall outcome of the tournament looked this way:
Queen's U. 7 - RMC 6
Queen's U 20 - York U. 2
York U. 3 - U. of Toronto 17
York U. 5 - RMC 14
Carleton U. 4 - U. of Toronto 22
Carleton U. 4 - RMC 8
Queen's U. 20 - Carleton 7
Queen's U. 6 - U. of Toronto 7



Queen's waterpolo Gaels now travel to the U. of Waterloo for the OUAA Finals on December 6. Due to Christmas exams, the Queen's team will be minus at least three of its top players at Waterloo next week and therefore the outlook for a successful finish is bleak.

This last tournament represented the end of University waterpolo for Dave Kay, Paul Nolan, Chris Whately and Gord Houston.

Queen's finished 2nd to U of T as Waterpolo tournament came to a spectacular close on weekend.

Hockey Gals held to tie with TO; handily defeat York U. 11-0

Woody

Queen's Ice Hockey gals wound up their 1975-76 pre-season action this weekend with a 5-5 tie with U. of Toronto and a 11-0 shellacing to York.

The Friday night match Toronto began with what has seemed to be the Gals normal performance so far this season - a slow start. Toronto, however, seemed to start slowly as well and despite two penalties assessed against Queen's, the first period was scoreless.

Defenceman Karen Scully set up Sue Wright in the first Queen's marker in the second period. Judy Cook increased the Queen's lead on a play sparked by Carol Pettey. Toronto soon destroyed the 2-0 score by tallying three unanswered goals to fashion a 3-2 lead to take into the 3rd period of play.

The intermission allowed Queen's to mix the magic potion of baby powder, water and other secret ingredients in order to hustle back into the game in the 3rd period. Winger Marg Bartlett tied the score using a newly developed (10 minute old) strategy and Sue Wright got the assist. Centre Jan Atkinson finished off a play sparked by Les Ferrari by blasting a slap-shot past the helpless Toronto goalie. "Quincey" Pettey got her second assist of the game when Janean Gerow made the score 5-3 for Queen's.

Toronto fought back and narrowed the lead on a deflected shot which eluded Queen's steady goalie Sue Hall. With 33 seconds remaining Toronto pulled their goalie in favour of a 6th attacker and tied the game on a play from a face-off in Queen's territory. As shots -on-goal indicate (23 - 23), the game was a cliff-hanger and all the excitement was too much for Toronto's Carol Slipetz, who let too much slip and added a 10 minute and game misconduct to a last-minute holding penalty.

Judy Cook of the Queen's Gals pokes one in past the helpless U. of T. goalie in Fridays 5-5 tie game. Queen's came back to defeat York 11-0 in the game on Saturday.

While the Gals have proven their fore-checking ability, their back-checking skill and propensity to put the puck in the net were still somewhat hazy. On Saturday afternoon, the Gals met York in an effort to wipe the doubts from the slate. Queen's rookie Annie Symes put Queen's on the scoreboard with a marker assisted by Judy Cook. Carol Pettey followed suit by setting up Jan "Yuk" Atkinson before Sandy "Whammy" Statten made the count 3-0.

In the second period, Queen's continued the strong start and Janean Gerow drove the puck past the post twice, being assisted each time by Sue Wright. Sue, thinking that Gerow's activity looked like fun, whistled through the York players and made the score 6-0. Of course, now everyone wanted to try it! Paula Cervinka stepped into the limelight with a goal assisted by Gerow and Pettey, rounding out the second period scoring. In the 3rd period, Sue Wright scored her second goal of the game, then picked up her 3rd assist by setting up a tally by Judy Cook Leslie Ferrari picked up a rebound from Carol Pettey to make the count 10-0 and Sandy Statten dug in to pick up her second marker, leaving a final score of 11-0.

As the score indicates, the game was somewhat lop-sided with shots-on-goal, Queen's 43, York 10. However, Cathy Smith recorded a well-earned shut-out for her persistent efforts in nets. The victory over York doesn't signify that the Gals problems have disappeared. They face two long road trips after Christmas against teams of a much higher calibre than York, and strong performances are essential if the Gals are to finish well in the standings. The York game did give an indication however that the Gals can score goals and keep the opposition hemmed up in their end. Further "gelling" of the lines, increased checking and goal-scoring must be the "target" for 1976.

Basketball...

Gals get going

C.C.

This past weekend the Queen's Women's Basketball team hosted Toronto and York in league play. Friday night the Toronto girls managed to pull an upset by defeating our gals 44-38. The game started slowly but Queen's held a 21-18 lead at half time. The second half proved to our team that a stationary offense just isn't successful. Toronto's zone defense seemed to stifle the usually effective offensive patterns of the Gals. The infrequent shooting lacked its typical accuracy. The 38 points were well idistributed throughout the line up with Kathy Keely shooting 10, Kim Headford with 8, and Mary Sellers with 6, to lead the scoring for Queen's. Kim and Mary were also tops under the boards in rebounding.

The Gals were not content with their performance and decided that a change in the offense might be helpful. So before Saturday afternoon's game with York, they had managed 2 strategy practises.

The York encounter started similarly to that with Toronto and Queen's. In fact, the half time score showed Queen's trailing by 5, 21-16. However due to some help from the spotter in the stands, helpful hints from the coach at the bench and renewed team hustle, the second half proved to be much more typical of our Gals' play. An effective press, the long awaited fast breaks and a thinking, imaginative moving offense, led to an eventual 47-35 victory.

Although the shooting percentage was not terrific, the Gals kept putting the ball up and fought hard for the rebounds. Headford led the way with 14 offensive rebounds and also scored 12 points. Other top scorers were Keely, with 13, and Jackie Gallipeau with 8.

The game was not without its moment of trauma, as the Gals limped away with two sprained ankles, a dislocated shoulder and hurting back. The most encouraging aspect of the weekend was the total team effort put forth by the gals. Everyone gave 100 per cent. This attitude will no doubt continue for the rest of the season. Tuesday (today) marks the end of the first half of the season. The Gals play Ottawa U at 6 pm in Bartlett Gym. This is an all important game and good fan support would be appreciated. The Gals record is 3-3 and a win could put them into second place. Please come out and give them your support!

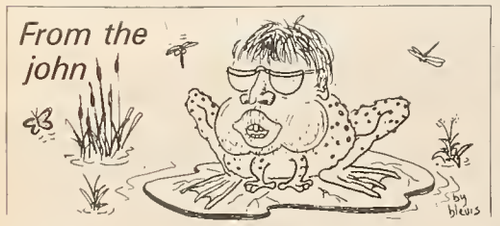
They tried and tried.....but couldn't seem to come up with any tactics to stop U. of T. in Fridays 44-38 loss.

The many faces of time

Throughout the educational system, punctuality is always taught as an asset and an important part of the learning process. Even though university students do not undergo the same scrutiny as pre-university students, professors do not enjoy having their lectures interrupted by late-comers, nor do most students enjoy being centred out by holding up lectures. Although people do their best to avoid such situations, there is the occasional factor that comes in to play and causes problems. The most common of these factors here at Queen's is the incredible differences in the clocks on campus.

The most prominent are those of Grant Hall Tower. Of the four faces, only one can be considered on time and even that one is a rough estimate.

The differences between buildings are more astounding. It is possible to leave buildings ten minutes before a scheduled class, and after a five minute walk, arrive ten minutes late, or arrive five minutes before you left.



After the power failure and after the time change it took up to one week before clocks were adjusted, and even then many of them had to be corrected by the students, causing even more discrepancy.

Grant Hall Tower is closely identified with Queen's and its broken time pieces do little to help our image.

Christmas break is coming and this would be an excellent time to not only repair the Tower clocks, but to coordinate all campus clocks and to set up a system whereby every morning the caretakers make sure that all the clocks are synchronized.

Professor Jeffery, designer of the Grant Hall clock, would not be impressed.

Bottomley

"All particles entering the atmosphere from outer space must have visas!"

This was the declaration of Russia's minister of immigration. "But why?" asked a younger member.

"If all particles are owned by Russia," explained the minister with an exaggerated show of patience, "no one else will be allowed to have them. If any fall on foreign land, we accuse the country of thievery. It will be a big propaganda victory, and soon Russia will own all space particles."

Other countries got similar ideas at the same time. The U.S launched a careful program designed to surround Earth's upper atmosphere with customs officials. It wanted all particles to swear an oath of allegiance. Canada, not to be outdone by her famous neighbor to the south, began her own preparations. She wanted to turn away all particles, no matter how useful.

In the U.N there was an uproar. Mtoombo, the delegate from a small African state too numerous to mention, declared opposition to the plan. "What good will it do if, for instance, all particles are rejected. There's no telling what Astronomers might learn from studying these particles."

Canada took this as a personal attack "If astronomers want to study particles, let them study our own," was the angry reply. "Why should we let outside particles get anything when we already have lots of particles right here on Earth?"

"The introverted nationalistic attitude being displayed by all those parties who are planning to issue visas to particles is abhorrant," Mtoombo declared. "There has never been a case where restrictions on particles has not caused some sort of grief."

Nobody listened. Within a year all the major powers of the world had surrounded Earth with inspection stations. Within another day, because no sunlight could get through the tightly packed mass of officials, the Earth died. Its death was deeply mourned by everyone.

Thick cloud around smoke issue

Dear Editors:

I feel I am forced to respond to the letter from Mr J. Vollman concerning my push for a ban on smoking in labs, lecturers, seminars, etc, at this university.

I was very disappointed to find this important issue being lost under complaints about "Misuse of Quasi-Political Powers". I apologise for having given such an impression, as it had been (and still is) my intention to bring it before the "D.S.C. as a whole" before claiming any majority support to our department head. However, even if such D.S.C. support was not forthcoming, I planned to present my case as an individual. I have, in fact, been in a position to give only personal opinions on previous issues to our department head, and it has always been my policy to make it very clear that it was, in fact, a personal opinion I was giving. I would certainly have proceeded no differently in this case. I think it should also be noted that Mr. Vollman is a member of the sociology D.S.C. and he and I have since discussed the issue.

But enough for the negatives. On the more positive side, I wish to report that the letter has elicited strong support in a great majority of the response to it. I wish to encourage, once again, all students to express themselves if they believe in the issue - not just to me, but to the relevant people in their departments, and, more importantly, to inconsiderate smokers in all cases

To sum up, then, petty politics aside, I believe that we all have a fundamental human right to free clean(?) air. Therefore I hope this issue will grow extremely quickly and strongly. I would love to see a student referendum, as this was my intention from the start. It seems that Western University has recently succeeded with this issue also. Why can't we? Come on, you silently suffering majority, let's get some action!!

Mud-slinging journal-ism

Dear Editors:

This is a specific complaint. Anyone writing in the Journal has considerable influence, considering the number of people who religiously read it, regardless of what is written. For that reason, I feel the staff, especially the editors, should assume more responsibility for their efforts. With the infrequency of his food reviews, Mr. David Colburn's original lambasting of The Square Rib took on a libelous tone, in the Journal issue of November 28, 1975, he affirms this intention in the manner by which he informs us of the demise of that restaurant In my opinion, this abuse of the power of the press is inexcusable, and throws a bad light on the quality of journalism of the Journal I feel Mr. Colburn's mud-slinging is better suited to the National Enquirer

Tenants feel that university damage claim unfair

Nancy Bowes

Tenants are liable for the damages they cause, according to the Landlord-Tenant Act. Landlords have recourse to the courts if there is a dispute over the value or perpetrator of the damage.

Queen's University, as a landlord, has the same rights as all other landlords. In fact, it also has another right, as was pointed out by Mr. Sam Lazier, Executive Assistant to the Vice-Principal (Administration): "All information concerning adademic results of any student having an overdue debt owing to the University shall be withheld until the debt is settled." (See page 413 of the Arts Calendar.)

The Queen's Tenants' Association is concerned with the "possibility for injustice" inherent in the situation, known in legal circles as double jeopardy, said Association Chairman Bruce Millar.

Tenants entering Married Students' Quarters are required by the lease to list problems with the apartment within forty-eight hours of taking possession. Tenants may assume that Queen's accepts their reports as a starting point, unless they are challenged Mr. John Richardson, Housing and Property Manager, explained that after vacating the apartment of all belongings, but before leaving Kingston, the tenant is responsible for arranging an inspection of the premises by the University. It is important that both landlord and tenant be present at this inspection.

The Outgoing Reports are not being based on a mutual inspection. Tenants often leave without notifying the University. Sometimes they leave at a time when the University cannot send anyone to inspect the apartment.

An inspection conducted only by the University constitutues a claim. The Tenants' Association sees a crucial difference between a claim and a charge The Association considers it unfair that the people with the claim also have the penalty. In court, the person with the claim stands equal to the person against whom the claim is being made. Both stand before a judge who holds the penalty.

The Tenants' Association and the University are desirous of a workable, low-cost system where there is mutual inspection of rented premises before taking occupancy and after vacating the apartment. The many details inherent in such a system have yet to be worked ut.

Book rebates result from double-tickets

OTTAWA (CUP) - Federal legislation awaiting Senate approval has enabled students in the Carleton University Political Science department to qualify for partial rebates on two required textbooks.

Bill C-2 was passed by the House of Commons on 16 October and includes amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. One of them says the lowest price must be charged on double-ticketed consumer goods.

With this information in hand Lew Haskell, a Political Science representative on the student-run New University Government, asked Penguin Books of Canada why the higher of the two prices on additional orders of two books by Carleton's book store was being charged.

Editions of Plato's The Laws and Artistole's The Politics ordered in April contained backcover prices of $2.50 and $1.95 respectively. Additional orders this fall had the same prices printed on the covers, but on the inside the bookstore stamp said $4.25 and $3.50.

After checking with the bookstore's senior bookbuyer, Maude Bones, Haskell said "it was obvious the bookstore wasn't at fault" because their invoices also contained the marked-up prices.

A Penguin representative explained that bookcovers are more costly to print than texts and those in question were two years old. Increased printing costs demanded higher prices and Penguin had passed these on with old prices still intact.

Haskell raised the possibility of legal action concerning the 111 copies and Penguin agreed to grant rebates equal to the increases.

According to Bones, the rebates should arrive when the postal strike is over She said she has no sympathy for publishers "who are stupid enough to pre-price" and neglect to blank out old prices with stickers.

Bones said a bookstore spotcheck had uncovered other cases of double-ticketing, some to the advantage of students. But, she added, the bookstore would not pursue other publishers like Penguin since that option is open to students.

The trouble with time

After reading the editorial, "The many faces of time" in Tuesday's Journal, Johnny Walker, an elevator mechanic for Physical Plant and keeper of the Grant Hall tower clocks enlightened the Journal about the Grant clock situation.

Walker contends that the east face is the only clock face on the tower that is in poor working order. Walker attributes this to student pranks. "The face was broken the last time a Mickey Mouse was drawn on the clock face" according to Walker.

For five years Walker has been in charge of the clocks in the Grant Hall tower and is famous for his "rubber band" repairs. At one point when the clock, designed by Professor Jeffrey, was broken, Walker was able to fix it with the aid of an elastic band. The band is now crucial to the optimal performance of the clocks.

Mac grads join CUPE

HAMILTON (CUP) ---- McMaster graduate students have decided to campaign for membership in the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

The decision was made at the October 28 general meeting of the Union of Graduate Students, and was based on a report sent by the executive to all the members.

Discussion of unionization began as a result of the lack of agreement between the UGS and the university administration on such issues as support levels, merit scholarship, grievance procedures, and full time employee status.

Since 1972 the Ontario provincial government has taken a number of measures with regard to post-secondary education, which have serious effects on the accessibility to and quality of education.

As far as McMaster graduate students are concerned, this has meant a rise in tuition of $300 in 1972 (which led to a strike by graduate students that same year resulting in the university paying the increase) and the freezing of teaching assistanceship levels at $3,000.

The consequences are clear: larger classes, increased undergraduate-graduate ratios, decreasing facilities per student. For grad students, this has meant increased teaching loads, and additional demands for outside research, all at the expense of their own studies.

Beyond the books

Gerry Lewarne, Rob Reynolds

Postal strike over

The postal strike that has been going on for six weeks, is now over. The final vote was 52 per cent in favour across the country, while Toronto's local voted 82 per cent in favour. The package that the union voted on was essentially the same package that the union was first presented with by the postmaster general six weeks ago. The 2,000 workers that had gone back to work were not allowed to vote, said the union leaders, "because they had already cast their vote." However, those 2,000 votes were not counted in the final vote. The chief labour writer for the Financial Post said Wednesday night on CBC's "As It Happens" that the postal union were being used as shock troops for the federal government's high profile fight on inflation. Another important union contract coming up is the negotiations with the Canadian Public Service Alliance, which represents about 130,000 federal civil servants.

Metro school board offer too high

Jean-Luc Pepin, head of the federal government's Anti-Inflation Board, said last Friday that the offer made by the Toronto Metro School Board of 39.2 per cent was too high to fall within the guidelines set out by the federal government. This decision is the first ruling handed down by the AIB and it is expected to set the tone for other judgments to come. Needless to say, the teachers were rather upset and the ruling elicited comments such as "I can make more money in business, so I will leave teaching" and "How do they expect us to teach on such low wages?"

Five hundred of those angry teachers were sent to Ottawa to protest outside the Parliament buildings. When Donald MacDonald, federal finance minister, came out to sooth the masses he was met by cries of "bullshit".

Now just a minute here, teaching is a profession that people go into because they want to, not because they have to. They knew when they went into teaching that they wouldn't receive a great deal of money and that they were not working in a profit-seeking institution. Now we are told that they could have made more money in business, even though we knew that already and they are professionals when they cry "bullshit". Can you imagine what would have happened if you had said that to your Grade 10 English teacher? Of course they are in good company; guess who said "mange la Merde"?

Armed camp at Vancouver

Barney Danson, federal minister of urban affairs, called upon the Canadian Jewish community to cease its protests to the upcoming Habitat Conference in Vancouver, to be held later this year. The Jewish community is protesting against the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization at the June, United Nations Conference. Politicians in Vancouver have gone as far to infer that Vancouver will become an "armed camp" during the conference. In the face of this mounting hysteria, Danson, the only Jewish member of the Cabinet, urged Canadians not to build an atmosphere of confrontation and hostility before the Conference.

Rough road in Quebec

The scandal that has just arisen centres on the $95,000 profit derived by Senator Louis Giguere, former Libreal Party Fund raiser in Quebec. He acquired shares of Sky Shops Ltd at a time when Sky Shops was trying to renew its lease at Dorval Airport. Giguere purchased the shares at $1 apiece and subsequently shold his stock at $20 a share. RCMP investigation extended to implicate former minister of transport Jean Marchand and the Liberal fund raising organization of Quebec. The centre of controversy was Minister Jean Marchand's accusation that the RCMP had tipped off the media to the time of the RCMP visit to his office. Newsmen were present at Marchand's office 10 minutes prior to the arrival of the RCMP.

Marchand's accusations "stole the spotlight" from the Skyshops Affair. Marchand accused the RCMP of anti-French sentiment and exceeding their powers. Marchand stated in the House of Commons that "Some of them (RCMP) think they are above everything. I do not want another CIA in this country."Health Minister Marc Lalonde entered the controversy by supporting Marchand's allegations of anti-French sentiment in the RCMP. Lalonde went on to implicate a Cabinet split along English-French lines. Are the Liberal's merely trying to stifle RCMP Investigations into Senator Giguere's Sky Shops affair or does their concern really lie in what is hidden in the files of the Quebec Liberal fund raising organizations.

Grant Hall burnt down Wednesday night. There were no survivors. The conflagration lasted less than ten minutes, and totally destroyed the entire building, except for a few smelly oil-covered rags jammed inside bottles. The Kingston Fire Bureau when asked to comment on the possible causes of The Great Grant Hall Fire remarked: "Gee, gosh... we really don't know, maybe it was bad luck."

There was no chance for the fire bureau's fire fighting machinery to reach the site of the blaze. However, the fire hoses were put to good use as the Ban Righ Block Council enlisted the aid of the stalwart Fire fighters in flooding the playing field above the parking garage and creating a massive skating rink. Kingston Hall was left miraculously unscathed. Principle Witts did not know what to say. Until today no one except one Journal reporter has noticed the fire .

Student government scrutinized at UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — University of British Columbia students will soon decide whether to radically alter the structure of their student union.

Students are being asked in a week-long referendum to either accept or reject a new constitution which would give undergraduate societies almost complete autonomy, and do away with the traditional form of student government.

Under the proposed constitution, undergraduate societies would have the option of becoming independant branch societies of the Alma Mater Society, the UBC student union.

A branch society would have complete control over its own budget and, through a vote of its members, could increase the student fee levy for students in that undergraduate society.

Under the current constitution, the AMS funds undergraduate societies according to the number of students in that society, and the council must approve their budgets before any money can be spent.

The constitution will divide the student's council into two governing bodies: one ten person committee concerned solely with administrative decisions of the student union, the other consisting of student members of the University Board of Governors and the University Senate and the presidents of the undergraduate societies.

According to Dave Van Blarcom, Student Vice-President and one of the drafters of the proposed constitution, the intent is to stop the practice of electing students specifically to sit on a student assembly.

Members of the student council would be students already elected to positions where they can effect changes in the university structures, he said.

Blarcom said the new student council would primarily deal with questions arising out of Board and Senate meetings. This would give student Senators and Board members some idea of what students are thinking, he said, but would not bind them to vote in Senate and Board in any particular way.

The students council currently consists of 35 to 40 students elected to council.

The only power council has is over allocation of the nondiscretionary portion of student fees. The current AMS has no influence in any decision making body which has the power to make academic or financial decisions concerning UBC.

Because of this impotence, the AMS is mockingly referred to as "Anyone Making Speeches."

Spending review report condemned by OFS

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) has condemned the report of the Special Committee on Government Spending as "the manifesto of a highly partisan group of Conservatives and business representatives."

The report, unveiled in the legislature on 20 November, suggested that tuition fees be increased by 65 per cent. This step would save the province $80 million annually.

An additional $40 million could be saved by decreasing the maximum student grant from $3200 to $2200 per year, and increasing the maximum student loan from $800 to $1800 per year.

In a statement released on 26 November, the OFS called the recommendations "typical of the Committee's simplistic and dogmatic 'solutions' to problems that are extremely complex. The public should be aware that the price paid for increased tuition fees and reduced grants would be a dramatic reduction in accessibility to post-secondary education. In effect, this report is recommending that all but a few of the places in our colleges and universities should be reserved for those from wealthy backgrounds."

The OFS feels the timing of the report was "particularly unfortunate" since it coincided with the beginning of a series of hearings into student aid by the province. OFS Information Officer Chris Harries charged that the government seems to be more interested in "partisan manifestos" on the subject, instead of trying to establish a "meaningful dialogue."

But OFS still plans to attend the public hearings and submit its brief on student aid. The OFS is "content to put its case before the public and to make it quite clear that its members cannot afford, and will not agree to, the policies recommended in this report."

Marathon dance planned

Marie Maceagno of
Camp Outlook

Once again Camp Outlook will be holding Danceathon, their annual 12-hour marathon dance. It will take place in Grant Hall on 30 January, 1976, and will run from 8 pm to 8 am.

Danceathon is a major fund-raising activity for Camp Outlook, and last year pledges brought in more than $2900 dollars. It is run like Miles for Millions, except that a participant is sponsored per half hour that he-she attends the dance. It is not necessary to stay the whole night (although it is encouraged), nor is it necessary to come with a partner! All we need is enthusiastic people interested in having a good time!

For all those who do not know about Camp Outlook it is a volunteer organization run by Queen's students, and a registered government charity. The Camp deals with deserving teenagers from the Kingston area referred to us by various social agencies. During July and August Outlook takes out 10-day canoe trips from May to August. A successful weekend follow-up program has evolved which allows staff and campers to maintain relations during the winter.

The marathon this year has been sponsored by ArtsSci '79, and we have received many donations for prizes from Kingston merchants. These prizes are awarded for the various contests held during the 12 hours (and once again the Jiving Contest promises to be a highlight of the evening). The support of everyone involved is much appreciated. Pledge cards for Danceathon are available from the JOHN ORR ROOM until December 5; after that they will be available from the Outlook Office until classes resume. Watch the Queen's Journal for further developments concerning DANCEATHON

by Duncan MacDonnell

Although the issue has been beaten to death by now, I feel that I must comment upon the so-called "Gray Affair" as I feel a great injustice has been done regardless of the fact that the legality of the constitution was upheld. The fact remains that John Gray dedicated the past year and a half to the Alma Mater Society so completely that his academics were neglected to the extent that non-student status was imposed upon him. He was more concerned with the welfare of the Alma Mater Society than that of his academics and resultingly received the cold shoulder from his associates. Where is the justice in that situation, I ask you?

I suggest that this situation evolved due to the fact that only the one per cent (probably an overestimation) of the students with an active political interest make an effort to get involved and this minority seemed to think that they would somehow benefit from Mr. Gary's removal. Their reasoning escapes me but at least they felt strongly enough to be involved.

However, personally having had the time and the opportunity to discuss the situation with a broad cross-section of students, I have come to the conclusion that the general campus feeling was in Mr. Gray's favour. So where were the other ninety-nine per cent of you students when it came down to the crunch (AMS General Meeting)? It seems, unfortunately, that you couldn't spare the hour to see justice done as much as you all seemed to favour it.

I believe that a large share of the guilt in this particular case can be laid at the doorstep of the Journal for their biased and shallow reporting of the entire affair. Except for Terry Collins (who deserves sincere congratulations for his efforts on Mr. Gray's behalf) the entire Journal staff appeared to have taken it upon themselves to present an anti-Gray facade. It was necessary to refer to the Whig Standard's Queen's section to get a true, factual and up-to-date account of the affair.

The problem on this campus seems to be a lack of a true representation of Queen's students throughout the various areas of student concerns. It seems "little cliques" have formed around these functions and are naturally more representative of their own interests than those of the general student body at large. But at least these people are involved regardless of the motivation. What about the rest of you? Well it appears that you are absorbed in your own little worlds which in the majority of cases seem to revolve solely around your academic and social spheres. It is about time you you all came out of your shells and realized that there is more going on around this campus and community than you seem to realize. The Student Volunteer Bureau, Camp Outlook, the AMS and even the Journal can always use new blood to keep them functioning and representative of Queen's. Prove that you are not just another "no mind", go out there and do something, get involved! There is still hope!

Don't teach, swallow swords

WATERLOO (CUP) — Teaching jobs at Ontario secondary schools will be harder to find over the next few years, according to Deb Thompson who spoke November 6 at a Career Information seminar at the University of Waterloo.

The reason is simple. The high school student population is expected to decrease by 16 percent between now and 1980, she explained. and a decrease in students means less demand for teachers.

According to a survey of 600 Ontario secondary schools, there is already an oversupply of teachers in history, english, and boys' physical educatioon.

But shortages still exist in technical and commercial subjects, as well as in mathematics, music, home economics and art.

One factor leading to increased or decreased demand in particular teaching areas is the introduction of the credit course system which allows students to select the subjects they wish to study.

Unimproved journalism

Dear Editors:

I have two general complaints to make, both related to basic rules of journalistic reporting, which were obviously not followed in the Journal issue of Nov. 28, 1975. The first relates to Mr. David Colburn's article and to the five W's - specifically, what has Doug Hutchinson done of extra-curricular nature in order to qualify for the Rhodes scholarship which he was awarded? It's almost an instinctive question of anyone reading that article, and I feel it should have been answered.

The second is a reminder to avoid broad, sweeping statements especially if you have not properly researched the related facts. This is in regard to Miss Barb Nyland's statement of the front page, that Queen's Dept. of the History of Medical and Related Sciences is the only one presently in existence in Ontario universities. May I point out that the University of Western Ontario has offered courses and degrees, both at the undergraduate and Master's degree, level, through the Department of the History of Science and Medicine, for two years, since the academic year 1974-75.

I certainly hope the Journal makes some effort at self-improvement, for I certainly feel that the quality journalism it presently offers, could use it.

Raymond Marina

P.S. How about cleaning up the masthead?

Ed. note:
The University of Western Ontario has had a department of the history of medicine and science for a number of years, but the study of the history of medicine is merely studied as a subject area within the larger scope of this history of science. Queen's is the first university to have a Department of the History of Medicine and Related sciences which is totally concerned with the history of health sciences.

Unlikely reply to art question

Dear Editors;

This letter is written in response to the recent Journal article entitled "Art and free expression". It was directed against Ian McLeans letter which made the point "an artist is not entitled to impose his works on the public if the works are offensive".

Mr. McLeans example of a sculpture of a dead baby on a pitchfork sprayed with plastic was rejected, because it used the wrong medium (once living human flesh) for free expression.

Tell me, if the artist had decided to make a sculpture of a man making love to a sheep (in cement, the accepted medium for free expression) in whatever position you can imagine, should this sculpture be allowed in a busy park on the shore of lake Ontario? If you answer No then how did you come to this answer? If you accept free artistic expression in public places, then the only difference between "Pollution" and "Sodomy" would be a matter of degree. Unless a qualitative difference exists between them then the rejection of "Sodomy" and acceptance of 'Pollution' is based on an arbitrary distinction between them.

I wish I owned a bulldozer (I hope this inspires some bulldozer owners) and I would end the 'Pollution' controversy once and for all. I'm sure there would be a lot of fines, screaming, shouting, court cases, bitching, and people jumping up and down, but no one would bother dragging that hunk of shit out of the lake.

Naelem Nai (A lonely shepherd)

Unfriendly north of border

Dear Editors:

This last weekend, I decided to drive up from New York to visit with my girlfriend. I'd never been to Queen's before (or Canada for that matter), and was somewhat disappointed after being shown around and introduced to a few people. I've always been told how warm and friendly Canadians were in comparison to Americans, but I found it to be exactly the opposite.

My girlfriend said that it was just because exams were approaching and that usually people's attitudes were much different, but I don't think so. Despite all her protests, I know that she is having a really shitty time of it at Queen's. Because she has always been very popular in the States, I will attribute her lack of popularity here to be due to her being an American.

My only advice to Queen's people would be to grow up. Prejudices against people because of their race, creed, religion, sexual preferences, nationality and the like went out of style in high school. My girl friend, and other Americans and foreigners in similar situations, came to Queen's hoping not only for a half decent education but also for some show of common friendship on the part of the people she has been forced to work and live with. I wish that I could stay up here with her (or that she would come down with me) and give her some company for the next term, but that is out of the question because I have my own university to go to in the States.

But I will ask this of Queen's students: if you can possibly rationalize your anti-American feelings then you're welcome to them. If not, then try to overcome them, and give your fellow American students a break and a chance to prove themselves as individuals, and not just representatives of some hateful country lying somewhere down South.

Unveiling the... Word of Week

Dear Editors:

I would like to invite all the Queen's students (especially the Engineers!) to meet with me outside the Purple Room of the Douglas library tomorrow. At this meeting we shall choose the "Word of the Week".

We hope that A.J. Sheppard will be able to make a guest appearance. As you probably know, he is the winner of last week's contest. Not only that, but he managed to use the same word nine times in one letter to the editors of this paper! Here is a man of great talent, and his very presence is guaranteed to "magically infuse us with enough knowledge to pass all of our exams". Afterwards, we can all retire to the stacks for a "cup of coffee"

How long will OSAP zap students?

Peter O'Malley
Canadian University Press

TORONTO (CUP) - During the heyday of debate in the 1960's and early '70's one side argued that since students were the ones to benefit from post-secondary education, they should bear the main responsibility for paying the cost involved.

Tuition fees should be maintained at their present levels, if not increased they said, and anyone who needs financial assistance should get it in the form of a loan repayable upon termination of studies.

Opponents contended that education was a "right" for all, that society as a whole benefited from an educated population, and therefore society should bear the cost, just like any other "social service".

Moreover, to promote "universal accessibility", regardless of economic background, education should be free to the student, they said. Tuition fees should be eliminated and all students should receive an income to live on while at school.

Anyone who pays tuition or who signs student loan forms has all the evidence needed to prove the outcome of that debate.

But last summer the Ontario government officially reopened the discussion, which has continued anyway, since the '60's, by announcing that a committee would be set up to hear briefs and make a report on the future of student aid in that province. It would, the government claimed, take a "fresh look at student aid."

In its brief to be presented to the Committee in January, the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) states quite clearly it is "apprehensive about the political meaning of this exercise" or about how "fresh" a look is intended.

"Given the past performance of our friends at Queen's Park (the Ontario Legislature), we have a nagging suspicion that the committee's deliberations are merely a front to justify a policy change which will not be in the interests of students or those who have not the opportunity to become students", the OFS says in its brief.

"Why are we doing this?" it asks, without really providing an answer.. But, last September, when the OFS met in Kingston and discussed whether to submit a brief or just ignore the committee, an answer was given that persuaded student delegates present.

The publication of a brief and the appearance of OFS and other student groups before the committee would give students an opportunity to restate their position on student aid for the benefit of anyone who would listen, even the committee. And it could provide an opportunity to organize around the hearings to demonstrate student support for that position.

As for the brief itself, nothing new is said, and its main thrust is to repeat the demand that tuition fees be abolished and that an all-grant form of student assistance be instituted.

The brief does provide, however, an "update" statement of the substance of those two major policy positions which have been officially supported by almost every student organization in Canada, as well as an analysis of the reasons why the present student aid systems have done nothing to alter "the continuing class bias in the demographic profile of our institutions."

Abolition of tuition fees

Fees, according to the brief, "are a form of regressive taxation" which "represent a financial barrier to accessibility".

"Students are required to pay a set amount towards the operation of an educational institution. Each student, regardless of income or background, pays the same fee for the same area of study...(they) are individually 'taxed' before being allowed to pursue their education."

The brief calls this "as unfair and arbitrary as any other form of taxation which requires both those who have and those who haven't to contribute equally" and notes agreement with the statement by the Ontario Federation of Labour that:

"...we totally reject the theory of using education as a means of hidden or indirect taxation. If our taxing policies are such that they do not provide sufficient equity then they should be amended. University fees should not be used for this purpose."

The brief takes issue with those who argue that tuition fees should be maintained because students, as consumers of the services provided by educational institutions, are the primary beneficiaries of these services.

OFS rejects this "market place definition" of the educational process because "the end result has been, and will continue to be, regardless of any assistance scheme, that those who are able to pay take advantage of this service" while those who can't, won't.

The brief also notes that "there exists no adequate method to determine, on a cost-benefit basis, the value of education" accruing to the student and to the society, and "even if one did exist, the question remains as to why this would be applied in an arbitrary and artificial manner to the post-secondary level only."

The brief also rejects the contention that "tuition can be used to filter out those with low motivation and those unprepared to continue their education."

OFS calls this belief "naive" and "unthinking". The brief cites a 1972 study in Canada which indicated that a high degree of ambition did exist among low-income children surveyed, despite the fact that proportionately fewer of this group actually make it to a university.

According to OFS, "motivational factors are related to socio-economic background both in terms of level and type of aspirations" and the only effect of the high cost of education is to deter those from low-income backgrounds.

But tuition fees are not just a regressive tax and a deterent, the brief states. Because of the "wide variance in fees" depending on the type of post-secondary education sought, they are "coersive" and used to "stream" different classes into different types of education.

The highest fees are found in the professional schools, then come the general university programs, while community college education comes cheaper still, and retraining schemes provided through the community colleges are free.

Consequently, those who can afford the high cost of university education can aspire to professional and managerial positions. Those who cannot afford [illegible] time and money needed for univ[illegible] studies settle for the middle-in[illegible] positions which follow from comm[illegible] college training. Working class [illegible] who want to upgrade their skills m[illegible] while, are steered into apprentic[illegible] programs due to their lower cost to [illegible] student.

The brief concludes that the vari[illegible] in fees "has been instituted in such [illegible] manner as to stream classes of [illegible] back into those positions in the soc[illegible] structure from which they came."

"The elimination of this sing[illegible] financial barrier (fees) could aid [illegible] changing the social-economic mix [illegible] different programs", the brief states, a[illegible] thus promote "a more equitable a[illegible] egalitarian society."

All grant student aid

The OFS brief reiterates its posi[illegible] that, if "universal accessibility" [illegible] education is to be promoted, then mor[illegible] required than simply abolishing tu[illegible] fees. All students must be provided wi[illegible] "guaranteed annual income" to live [illegible] while they study.

The brief notes that the last "fre[illegible] look" at student aid in the 1960's and ear[illegible] 70's did arrive at "one overwhelm[illegible] concensus; universal accessibility a[illegible] equality of opportunity to post-second[illegible] education in Ontario did not exist. Mo[illegible] particularly, it did not exist for 'low[illegible] class' people".

Because lower-income people [illegible] under-represented, at post second[illegible] institutions, some policy makers bega[illegible] argue that continued subsidization of [illegible] post-secondary sector out of general [illegible] revenues was unfair to the lower-in[illegible] groups who did not benefit, but who [illegible] the bulk of the taxes. They also used [illegible] argument to reject the proposal for [illegible] living stipend for students.

The brief calls this argume[illegible] "curious" since it "rejects the [illegible] mechanisms necessary for guaranteed [illegible] equal access to post-secondary educa[illegible] on the grounds that it will be less equita[illegible] in the long run due to a regressive [illegible] system."

"Surely it would be more sensible [illegible] direct one's assault at the tax system [illegible] self", the brief states, particularly "on [illegible] question of the benefits derived by [illegible] corporate sector" from post-secon[illegible] education in comparison with what [illegible] porations pay in taxes.

The brief says that post-secon[illegible] education is "probably the most [illegible] independent variable on the corpo[illegible] ledger." Without a post-secondary sys[illegible] and the highly trained manpower [illegible] produces, our "relatively advanced [illegible] dustrial society would grind to a halt. [illegible] it would go all corporate income."

And how much do corporations sh[illegible] in paying the costs of education?

"During the seven year period fr[illegible] 1967-74, when expenditures on po[illegible] secondary education were boom[illegible] corporate profits were booming as w[illegible] increasing 250 percent from 5.6 billio[illegible] 19.5 billion. Personal income, mean[illegible] increased at a more modest 125 pe[illegible] from 33 billion to 74 billion."

"Despite this relatively fast growt[illegible] corporate income during this period, [illegible] corporate share of the cost of public [illegible] penditure fell as a proportion of [illegible] revenue sources, from 11.3 percent to 10.7 percent. Personal income tax, on the other hand, increased as a source of revenue from 16.2 percent to 18.3 percent."

"The inference is quite clear: during the period when spending in post-secondary education "took off" the relative proportion of the corporate tax as a source of government revenue fell. On this basis alone it is not difficult to argue that corporations failed to pay their fair share of the cost of expanding post-secondary education."

Conclusion

The conclusion of the brief indicates OFS is aware that its main conclusions - that tuition be abolished and a living stipend provided - "are out of the mainstream of student financing schemes."

The reason, according to the brief, is that OFS wants an aid system "which is designed to alter the composition of the student bodies at post-secondary institutions" by increasing accessibility for low-income groups "and not just meet present needs."

"We do not believe, in other words, that it is justifiable for one to say that most students come from higher income homes and should therefore pay more. We believe that we must move forward."

OFS will present its brief to the Ontario Advisory Committee on Student Financial Assistance on January 22, and a rally of students from Toronto-based and other post secondary institutions in the province is being planned for that day.

A university education costs some people an arm and.... case

Universal accessibility

Sarah Yarnell

Free tuition and a living allowance for students are the long-term goals of the student aid campaign in which Queen's AMS government is currently participating. The AMS reaffirmed its policy of universal accessibility in a brief which is to be presented today in Ottawa to the provincial government's Interim Committee on Financial Assistance for Students.

Tuition and a student's cost of living are considerable financial barriers for many people who want a post-secondary education, according to the AMS brief. The student government has said, however, that free tuition and a living stipend are distant goals, and so have limited the brief's recommendations to ideas for improving the current assistance programmes.

The brief reflects a version of the philosophy of "the user pays", and includes as those who benefit from a person's university education the graduate earning a good salary, the employer, and society as a whole.

Assistance programmes should be designed not only for the male undergraduate who has come to university directly from high school, but for grad students, those with dependents, married students, female students, mature students and those who attend on a part-time basis.

The brief suggests that the age of independence should be lowered to the age of majority because students should not be considered tied to their parents' income after age 18.

The Graduate Scholarship Programme should be expanded to cover a minimum of one quarter of the grad students in Ontario: "We suggest that the level of award should match that of Canada Council or National Research Council awards. The Government should also examine the possibility of a provision, parallel to that in force for both the Canada Council and National Research Council doctoral scholarships, allowing the term of the grant to extend beyond one year (assuming satisfactory academic progress)."

The brief also recommends "that the Ontario Student Assistance Programme (OSAP) include a special status for graduate students, which will take into account the increased costs and special circumstances of graduate students."

A regionalized cost of living index is needed, according to the brief, and should be the base for determining living allowances.

The disabled, and native peoples, as well as others who might alrcady be receiving government assistance, should also be eligible for student aid.

Foreign students' support problems are mentioned in the brief, which recommends "that the availability of funding be based on need and academic competence, not extraneous factors such as citizenship; and that provisions for graduate student support adequately recognize the numbers of foreign students within Ontario universities, and the very vital social and academic role they play in Ontario universities."

Health care students should receive a full stipend for the services they provide to hospitals as part of their academic programmes, according to the brief.

Child care costs should be explored at the local level, and the allowance to students with children should be revised accordingly, states the brief.

Variety of student needs stressed in Senate brief

Nancy Bowes

Government aid programs must "recognize the different needs of the main groups" of the student body. This was one of the recommendations of the Senate Committee on Scholarships and Student Aid. The report will be submitted to the student aid hearings in Ottawa today.

For single undergraduate students, the Committee recommended that the "age of independence ought not to be reduced to eighteen." Frequent suggestions to reduce the age to eighteen have been made by OFS because such a step would allow every student to receive full assistance regardless of family wealth. The brief states that most university students "come from families in the top two quartiles of income distribution." To provide assistance regardless of family wealth would increase the burden carried by lower income groups of providing for post-secondary education through taxes, according to the brief.

The Committee also recommended that easier access to loans be provided to students denied assistance by their parents. Fairer methods of dealing with lack of summer savings need to be established. A further suggestion regarding single undergrads concerned an annual adjustment of the basis of assessment to reflect changing costs.

For married students, the Committee suggested making "provision for the support of a student's family, where the spouse is a homemaker with young children."

The Report strongly recommended that recipients of student assistance be assured of the minimum amount of support they may count on when they begin their program.

The Committee specifically rejected the idea that repayment of assistance take the form of public service.

When The World Was Young

A play for all ages

Singers, Crow, and Bluejay watch as Coyote tries to shoot down the sun

Following last year's production of Silver Bird and Scarlet Feather, the Queen's Drama Dept. once again presents a children's play for the Christmas Season.

When The World Was Young, a musical written and directed by Maurice Breslow, is based on myths of the Rocky Mountain Indians. The music has been written by Richard Bronskill, and costumes are by Margi Muir, with lighting by Conrad Hazen.

The production is a fanciful re-telling of some of the earliest Indian myths about the earth before man was created. The Indians would always begin such stories with "When the world was young, before people had come out,"and the characters of those stories were all the animals, the god Amotken and his wife, the evil spirit Amteep, and the sun and moon.

With song, dance movement and dialogue, a cast of twenty enact the creation of the earth, sun, and moon, the naming of the animals, a comic version of Coyote stealing the moon, the flood, the re-making of the earth, and finally, the creation of man.

The play will be performed Saturday 6 December at 10:30 am and 2pm, and Sunday 7 December, at 2pm. Tickets are available at the drama desk in the basement of Theological Hall, or at the door, or by phoning 547-6291. Admission is 50 cents per person.

From Women's Eyes

Women painters in Canada

International Women's Year has focused attention on the position of women in many fields in our society today. The historical presence of the woman artist in Canada, however, has not been fully investigated before. This exhibition has been undertaken to present a visual survey of the contribution of women painters from the seventeenth century. The organizers of the exhibition, Dorothy Farr and Natalie Luckyj, selected eighty-two works by forty-five artists who, they felt, had made or are making a positive contribution to the history of painting in Canada, irrespective of the distinction of sex.

A fully illustrated catalogue will accompany the exhibition and the authors provide a brief history of women painters in Canada as well as their comments on what they themselves discovered about women painters during their investigations.

The exhibition will be opend by Her Excellency Madame Leger at 7:30pm on Friday, December 12 and the public is invited to attend the opening. The exhibition will continue to 1 February, 1976.

Video and live presentation

Gregg Simpson, a painter, and printmaker, is also deeply involved in music and in the contemporary exploration of the multi-media phenomenon linking the visual and the auditory.

He is at present in Eastern Canada on tour from the Musique par Coeur, a Vancouver based new music ensemble. He was percussionist and sound-collagist with the Al Neil Trio, 1965-70; played in (or formed) the following ensembles: New Atlantis Houseband, 1971; Al Neil Jazz Probe, 1972; Apex, 1973; Sunship, 1974. He was also involved in starting the Sound Gallery and Intermedia's multi-media workshops (Vancouver). He is currently working in Video.

His work as a painter and printmaker has been widely exhibited in one-man and group exhibitions, mainly in British Columbia. In 1973 he organized, with the Fine Art Gallery of the University of British Columbia, an important group exhibition Canadian West Coast Hermetics and, with the help of the Canada Council, planned its showing in Europe - Paris, Belgium and London, England. It was also shown in Hamilton and London, Ontario. Eight works, (paintings and collages) by Gregg Simpson were included.

His performance in Kingston will include Video tapes "Turn if off", "Pacific Mix" and "Life with Dada", as well as, live, "The Sweet Terrain Suite", a version for solo performer of the "Sweet Terrain For Terrain" performed this year, in Montreal and Toronto, by the Musique par Coeur ensemble. Included in the piece are sections for Polynesiam bamboo sticks, Moroccan hand drum, Cymbals played in game lung style, piano, percussion, and pre-recorded tape selections by Gregg Simpson and Don Druick. There will also be a continuous slide presentation of paintings and collages by Gregg Simpson.

The performance will take place continuously each day, Saturday and Sunday, December 6 and 7, from 2 to 4:30 p.m., and admission is free.

By the way

The extension to the Agnes Etherington Art Centre will open December 13, 1975. Built to provide storage, shipping and other basic services for the existing building as well as 2,000 square feet of new gallery space and laboratories for the Master of Art Conservation Programme, it is a striking addition to the architecture of Queen's University.

The addition to the Agnes Etherington Art Centre will be formally opened to the public at 3:00pm on Saturday, December 13, by His Worship Mayor George Speal. The public is invited to attend.

For this occasion, there will be a special hanging in the new gallery, of works selected from the Permanent Collection and representative of such major donations to the collection as the Samuel and Ayala Zacks Collection, the Douglas Duncan Collection, the Alfred Bader Collection of Old Master works, the Ernest C. Gill gift of works by Daniel Fowler, the Queen's University Art Foundation, and other generous benefactors.

Other special exhibitions of local and regional interest, shown until December 31, 1975, will be; W. Christopher Woods: recent graphic works; George Harlow White (1817-1887): drawings and paintings; George Cockayne: folk artist from Eastern Ontario.

Mann

As an audience member who has enjoyed many varied shows this first term, from tragedy to farce, music to mime, I would like to take this time to thank a person who, although very vital to the success of a show, rarely gets the credit due to him-her, and whose job is quite misunderstood. I'm talking about the stage manager(ess). The SM puts up with tempermental actors, bored crew members, and worried directors. To the most maligned member of any form of artistic company I wish a happy Christmas and a merry New Year.

A few notes from Wic: After a long basketball season we finally have a winner; Nursing beat PHE 4 in overtime for the championship - a close and well-fought game! Congratulations!

Waterpolo will be played again in February.

In hockey championships team 2 tied team 3 and there was no time for overtime. Thanks to all the girls who came out and come out again for the activities next term!

BewsNews

Paul Findlay

If you read last week's Bews News you have probably been on tenterhooks all week to find out who won the Softball Championship. Last week's column left with Arts '77 having a 1 game lead over P.H.E. in the best of 3 series. On Wednesday, the teams met again. In the bottom of the last inning with the score tied 4-4, P.H.E. had loaded the bases with none out. Arts '77 however then proceeded to put out the side forcing the game into extra innings. The game was still tied after 10 innings when it was called due to darkness (i.e. the lights had to be turned off.) The game was continued the next night. The teams went through what was the equivalent of another full game when Arts '77 finally exploded for 4 runs in the top of the 17th inning and was able to hold P.H.E. off in the bottom of the 17th to take the game, the series and the Bews Softball Championship.

In Volleyball both the semi-finals and finals were played last Thursday. P.H.E. beat Chemical 2 games to 1 and Mining advanced to the final because Education was on its teaching week and was thus unable to muster a team. The best-of-five final series saw some excellent Volleyball. P.H.E. took the Bews Volleyball Championship from the defending champs, Mining, by a 3 games to 1 margin.

In Broomball, Division 1 both Commerce '77 and Law '76 are undefeated with 3 wins; Arts '77 is 2 and 1. In Division 2 Mechanical has 2 wins and Comm '76 has 2 wins and a loss. Division 3 has both Comm '78 and Bus Grads with 2-0-1 records.

In tournament sports not all of the finals have been played. In Tennis (believe it or not they are still trying to play) Bob O'Doherty of Comm '78 is to play Bruce McFarlane of P.H.E. In Squash Blain Baldwin of Arts '77 will meet Jim Pennington of Mechanical. Baldwin combined with Adrian Devlin to defeat Robin Riley and Don Miller of Arts '78 in the Squash Doubles final. In Paddleball Singles Rob Cook of Law '76 will take on Israel Barsky of Education in the finals while in Doubles John Courtwright and Dan McBurney of Law '76 will meet Adelio De Monte and Ronald Van De Merwe of Engineering Grads for the Championship.

The Bews standings have been revised. We have a new leader in Arts '77 by virtue of its Softball victory. P.H.E. has closed the gap somewhat since it was Volleyball Champion and Softball finalist. Mining has moved into the top 10, and Arts '76 moved into 6th place. Standings are:

1.	Arts '77	28555
2.	Comm '76	28263
3.	P.H.E.	27894
4.	Comm '77	23440
5.	Civil-Math	21732
6.	Arts '76	21080
7.	Law '77	20482
8.	Bus. Grads	20111
9.	Mechanical	19548
10.	Mining	17358
11.	Meds	17299
12.	Law '78	17035

V-Ball Gals lead East

Eleanor Barker

The Queen's Women's Volleyball team travelled to York this past weekend to participate in the OWIAA East Section I Tournament.

On Friday evening Queen's faced Ottawa University and Laurentian. In the past, Ottawa U. has had a strong team, but with their complete change in line-up Queen's with little trouble won 15-2, 15-2. Laurentian, as well, put up little resistance to the Gals attack as Queen's led 15-7, 15-3. Saturday, the Tricolor squad met with equal success trimming U. of T. 15-9, 15-4, and Carlton 15-3, 15-1.

The tournament culminated with Queen's matched against York in the final game of the day. The two teams, although undefeated, had both experienced rather sluggish play to that point due to weak opposition. York had suffered somewhat more than the Gals, having dropped many points to underserving teams. Queen's had played consistently well throughout, although the brilliance of their strong net game was definitely missing.

As a result, both teams were flying for the final match. York suddenly shook off their careless ways and put together their usual heady attack and scrambling defense. In retaliation Queen's came out strong on the nets with blocking and hitting in full gear. The match was exciting and enjoyable for spectators and players alike. The Gals took it 15-11, 14-16, 15-11 and first place in the OWIAA East with the first half of the schedule completed.

The fact that the Queen's team appears to be stronger with each tournament is due to the development of the first time players on the squad. Sue Higgins, Corrine MacAuley, Carol Wallingford, and Jill Calder joined a core of experienced players. At this point they are each making significant contributions to the teams success. Their potential along with that of the veterans as consistency increases is what points to Queen's as a leading contender in the OWIAA this year.

Gaels semi-finalists in men's volleyball

Tom Becke

On Saturday, Nov. 29 the Queen's Men's Volleyball team made it to the semi-finals in an Ottawa Valley Volleyball Association Tournament, which was held in Ottawa. They lost to Ottawa Onion Patch in two hard fought matches in the semi-finals. The team managed to win 50 percent of their games to reach the semi-finals. The scores of the games were:

Queen's 8	Ottawa Volleyball Club 15
Queen's 8	Ottawa Volleyball Club 14
Queen's 7	National Def.Headquarters 15
Queen's 15	N.D.H. 12
Queen's 15	Onion Patch (Juniors) 13
Queen's 15	O.P.(J) 9
Queen's 5	Hochelaga 15
Queen's 3	Hochelaga 15

The team played better in this their second tournament than they have previously. The team always gave the opposition a commanding lead, then they had to fight back hard to get back into the game. If the team can learn to start quicker and not give their opposition such a lead then they will win many more games.

Throughout the tournament Queen's showed periods of great strength in their offence. They hit the ball well and consistently. If Queen's can back up this offensive strength with an equally strong defense then the team can look forward to a berth in the Ontario finals.

The team has now quit for the Christmas break. The first weekend back to school they will be travelling out of town for a tournament but on the 17th of January Queen's will be hosting RMC and York in an inner-divisional tournament. This young team deserves your support. Hope to see you there.

Editor's note: To date we have no men's volleyball pictures. We are looking forward to getting some on January 17th.

Fencing 3rd

Last weekend. the Intercollegiate Women's Fencing Team placed third in Part I of the OWIAA Eastern Sectionals. The Queen's team consisted of Debbie Christian, Jane Poole, Jo Toms, Naimir and Sharon Mitchum. All but Debbie Christian were fencing in competition for the first time and they beld their own very well. Carleton won the competition with McGill placing second. Both had fairly strong teams with a few seasoned fencers. Ottawa U. had no team this year. Individually Queen's fencers placed well with Jane Pool placing fourth and Deb Christian placing sixth. Part ff of the Sectionals will take place in January at Carleton. The girls have a good chance of progressing to the finals from there both in the individual and team competition.

Queen's Squash

Gals 2nd in Tourney

Portia Leggat and Jan Longhurst

Last Saturday Queen's hosted the first intercollegiate squash tournament of the season. Six teams participated U. of T., McMaster, Waterloo, Western, Queen's and a composite team. The results were very close, with Queen's coming a close second to Waterloo.

Playing for Queen's were Sandra Harris, Portia Leggat, Marg Bartlett, Willa Henry and Roma Steele. Willa Henry won all her matches by a decisive margin, and when we needed a win against Waterloo she totally dominated the game winning 9-0, 9-6. She played every shot with poise and precision and her serving was strong and at times unreturnable. Portia Leggat played well against Linda Kempf of Waterloo, but unfortunately she and Sandra Harris found the same things happening in their respective losses. They knew where they wanted to put the ball but they weren't getting the good bounces. Marg Bartlett played a strong no. 3 and Roma Steele played well in her matches.

This was just a preliminary tournament. Next time we hope to beat our rival Waterloo.

c.c.

Tuesday marked the end of the first half of the Women's Basketball season. Despite the late arrival of Ottawa U. and the even later arrival of the referees, the Queen's Gals handed the Ottawa U Gee-Gees a 46-43 defeat. The game was typified by tough defence and tight presses. Although frequent fouls and an unusually high number of violations sometimes stalled the game, the Gals managed to set a fast pace and play their kind of game. Once again a total team effort and last minute calmness proved to be the key to the win.

Laura Mattson, a veteran of Laurentian U., played her best game of the season. Besides being tough on defence she lead the offensive attack with 17 points Penny Wedd and Kim Headford each contributed 6 points. The rest of the scoring was evenly distributed among the team.

With this victory the Gals rest in second place in the East, with half the season remaining. Laurentian sits in first place but is by no means unbeatable. So the second half should prove to be filled with key, vital and important basketball games. The Gals appreciate the fan support and look forward to your support in the New Year.

The men's basketball team also played Ottawa U. on Tuesday. They were defeated 83-75 but put together their best performance of the season. Top scorers were Dave Dempster with 21 points and Derek Swinnard and Andy Boniwell with 18 each. Inexperience showed in the 1st couple of minutes of the first half as they were outscored 12-2 after leading 24-21. In the second half they never did regain the lead.

By the end of the season this enthusiastic young team should be one to be contended with. Look out for some upsets!! Merry Christmas!!

Anti-smoking gets a light

Dear Editors:
I do not share John Vollman's willingness to abide by the will of the majority on the smoking ban issue. It seems to me that voting on questions of basic human rights is meaningless.

Below are excerpts from an article which appeared in the Journal some weeks ago, dealing with the effects of cigarette smoke on the body: "..smoking 7 cigarettes in 1 hour creates carbon monoxide levels of 90 parts per million for the person next to the smoker...tar and nicotine, 3-4 benzpyrene, suspected as a cancer-causing agent, ammonia and cadmium being investigated for damage to the air sacs of the lungs and causing emphysema; high levels of carbon monoxide in the blood prevent people from distinguishing relative brightness, and these people also show impaired performance on psychomotor tests."

Based on this evidence, I contend that the right of the non-smoker to study in a clean and healthy environment far exceeds the right of the smoker to light up whenever he wishes. I hope that all those who agree with this proposition will join me in urging the authorities of Queen's University to ban smoking in classrooms and lecture halls.

Anti-verbosity from the Brollie

Dear Editors;
As regards verbal dialogues, I submit that certain units of the student body basically utilize vocabulary items of advanced linear dimensions with increased negative effect. These people believe, as I basically understand it, that oversized words express impressive thoughts, but they really disguise empty noodles. Luckily, most people talk in English.

That's basically it.

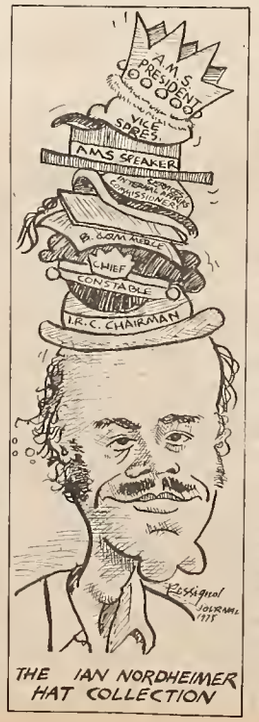
Copeland's churchmouse

From the sound of the 5c to $1 store bells, the sight of Thrifty Drug Mart candy canes, on your Lion's Club Christmas tree, and the jolly Ho! Ho! Ho! of the Simpson Sears' Santa Claus, it is evident that feeling of Corporate Christmas is in the air.

For most of North American society, Christmas has become much more than the time to celebrate the birth of a young child in the little town of Bethlehem nearly two thousand years ago. It now is a massive corporate enterprise. And the Christian community has played right into the corporations' hands, with raising hardly a voice in protest.

The spirit of giving has been replaced by the spirit of buying, and the spirit of joy has become an excuse for getting stoned or drunk. But what is really meant by the 'joy and giving' spirit of Christmas? We celebrate because God gave His Son, out of His love for us. When you give at Christmas, remember that it is out of your love that gifts are given. Give because you love, not because you feel obliged to give.



The joy at Christmas is a joy of receiving an undeserved gift. It is a joy that says life is worthwhile, and a natural high. Joy is seeing the sparkling eyes of a child, the feeling of love between people, and the sound of peaceful merry voices in the air.

We have become accustomed to giving corporate gifts, and we have forgotten the gifts of kindness, compassion, and love. To give with your heart this Christmas might mean visiting a friend in hospital, or calling on a grandparent. They sould like 'hooey' suggestions because it's so much easier to go down to 'The Bay' and buy a prepackaged gift. No matter, give your gifts, whatever they are, with a sense of love, and you will know the spirit of Christmas.

And what of the joy of Christmas? It is finishing exams and essays, and being able to go back to Smithville for a while to share with gentle folk of that community once again. It is knowing that this year has been especially rewarding and exciting, and that tomorrow holds promise as well.

Joy is being able to say thank-you to my editors for putting up with me and my "church mouse" for the last six weeks, and wishing them all the best of the Season.

And to you, the faithful readers of this weekly blurb, let me exten ' my wish for a Merry Christmas and a H. .py New Year. See you in '76.

Bottleneck
A lecturer was speaking recently about the importance of understanding.

"I think that if toul le monde would just macht nichts and try to parler plain, many of the Wellern affliges would be resoudu. Malawamba bojwobble is certainly better than nothing. Otherwise, we'll all be fertig."

"What did he say?" I asked my neighbor

"He said: 'I think that if we stopped and tried to communicate, many of the world's problems would be solved. Something or other I don't know what, is better than nothing. Otherwise we'll all be finished.'" was the reply.

"What were all those words he used that I didn't understand?"

"They were in forcign languages."

"Why didn't he speak English?"

"He's too smart for just one language. He likes to usc seven or eight when he's speaking because il gives his talks such tonc. It sounds rcal educated. Not everyone can learn cight languages, you know "

"Not many can understand eight languages either. Educated? It makes him sound like a linguistic casserole seasoned with stupidity. If he wanted us to understand him, why didn't he speak our language to us?"

"I bet you're just one of those guys who don't want to get showed up. You probably don't want anyone knowing more than one language."

"Far from it. I think it's great to speak more than one. But when you're using one, when your audience might only know one language, stick with that language. I'll bet he feels smart, too. I don't think "Malawamba bojwobble" means anything, anyway".

"It must. Otherwise he wouldn't have used it."

"That's dumb. All he's doing is making his lecture unintelligable to 97 percent of his listeners. And that's dumber "

"Jesus!" swore my neighbor, "Here I am, arguing with sheer fancy, gross illogic, airy nothingness, and lies, and how does this guy answer? With logic. With sense. How does he ever expect to get anywhere like that."

I gave in after that.

OFS mass rally planned over Henderson report

Ross Bartlett

Tonight the AMS Outer Council will be debating a proposal that Queen's students be encouraged and supported in attending a rally in Toronto on the 21st of the month. The purpose of the rally (called by the Ontario Federation of Students) is to protest the Ontario Government's "Henderson Report"

The report proposes that changes be made in government spending. Of particular interest to the OFS is the committee's recommendations that tuition be increased by up to 65 per cent and the grant portion of the student aid program be reduced in favour of an increased loan section.

The reaction by students to the proposals has not been favourable. The OFS has condemned the proposals as have most student councils. Peter Lane, AMS External Affairs Commissioner, referred to the report as lacking the "expertise and motivation to really examine what universities are doing, and if they will be able to continue once the recommendations are implemented". Further report recommendations are that there be no further increases in funding for either bigger enrolment or increased graduate programs, Lane claimed.

Lane feels that the report "represents an extreme position that the government wants response to". Using this response the government can prepare what "appears to be a conciliatory answer, but one which is still an aggravation of the problem. John Wilson, AMS Vice-President (University Affairs) says the report was "thrown out as a Green Paper but not government policy and the government wants feedback". This is what Wilson hopes the rally will give them.

What the OFS objects to is the fact that these recommendations will "massively increase costs for students", says Lane, "raising a prohibitive barrier to low and middle-income students". On the other hand, the report makes no mention of "OFS complaints about the present system which makes the age of independence 25, nor does it make any realistic appraisals of the needs for food, lodging and transportation". The OFS is also suspicious of the makeup of the committee which included two Ontario Cabinet ministers (one of whom was the Provincial Treasurer Darcy MacKeough) three senior civil servants and three "token" citizens (one of which was Maxwell Henderson, former Auditor General of Canada).

January 21st is the final day of the government's hearing on the Report and various provincial organizations such as the OFL (Ontario Federation of Labour) faculty groups and the OFS, will be there to "lodge their complaints with the government", according to Wilson.

Queen's students can expect more information to appear around the campus in the next few days. According to Lane the OFS is preparing a campaign that will include "buttons, booklets and posters attempting to gain support for the rally and the OFS position in general". Spurred on by the fact that U of T is epxecting "at least 5,000-7,000 students at the rally", the AMS has already hired a bus to take those from Queen's who wish to go, and further measures will be discussed at Outer Council tonight.

Grant increase welcomed

Giles Gherson

The provincial government has announced that it will increase operating grants to Ontario's colleges and universities by 14.4 per cent, a move which John MacDonald, Executive Director of the Council of Ontario Universities has referred to as "deeply appreciated" in an article in The Globe and Mail.

It is expected that the increased grant will go far towards easing effects of financial constraints which currently plague the province's post-secondary institutions, provided that inflation can be held at the Federal target of eight per cent.

In a statement issued December 15, Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities,stressed the significance of the level of support "in the light of the overall financial restraint."

Universities and other post-secondary institutions other than Colleges and Applied Arts and Technology (CAATs) will get $651 million. CAATs will receive $230 million.

The increased grant exceeds the federal government guideline of a 10 per cent increase in spending - a limit to which the provincial government has pledged itself. MacDonald noted that this recognises the high priority the government is placing on post-secondary education. According to an article in The Globe and Mail, the 14.4 per cent increase will translate into an extra seven per cent for each university student.

Christmas Aftermath. The presents have been opened and the gift wrap tossed aside. And in just another eleven months and seventeen days we will go through the whole routine once more.

Like It Is magazine told to change name

Sarah Yarnell

Like It Is, a new magazine which has been distributed free on several Canadian university campuses four times since last year, has been asked by Kingston lawyers Trumpour and Kennedy to change its name. Robert Kennedy said that his clients Norma J Pickering and Dr. Edward E. Johnston have held the copyright on the name since December 22, 1971. Pickering and Johnston are authors of Like It Is, a booklet on sex education aimed at high school students. Kennedy said that hundreds of thousands of copies of the booklet have been bought, many by the Federal Government, for distribution at schools.

Gary Price, publisher of Like It Is magazine, said that his reaction would depend on the advice of lawyers of Southam-Murray Publications, the printers of the magazine. "I'm not too worried about it. We don't have any assets. If they sue us, they're not going to get anything." He added, "If they're going to sue, they'll sue Southam"

In a letter to the magazine Kennedy asked for a written promise, by January 15,that the name would be changed and that no further copies would be distributed using the name 'Like It Is' When this paper went to press, Kennedy had received no reply from the magazine

Price said he did not try to get a copyright on the magazine's name because he already knew of a book called Like It Is.

"It's not a major hassle as far as we're concerned, " said Price. "We were going to change the name anyway. People have told us that it is childish, trendish and not even grammatical." He said that there may be a contest to find a new name for the publication.

Like It Is magazine is directed towards university students and is supported solely by advertising.

You better start looking for a summer job now!

Nancy Bowes

If you have not yet started to look for a summer job, now is the time to start, according to Ellen Rayko, Summer Employment Officer at Career Planning and Placement.

Although many of the larger corporations have already conducted preliminary interviews, smaller companies are just beginning to estimate their requirements for summer help.

The Career Planning and Placement Office can assist you in your search for a summer job. The Summer Employment Registration System uses a computer to match students' qualifications with job requirements. Last year, eighteen hundred students used the programme in their search for a summer job. Career Planning and Placement Director, Jim Kelly, feels that the programme "is effective in notifying students of positions." But registering with Career Planning and Placement is only the beginning of the search.

Students are advised to consult the Career Planning and Placement column in Golden Words and the Summer Employment Board in the Career Planning and Placement Office to keep abreast of positions being offered. Industrial directories and reference material on resume writing and interview techniques are also available to assist students.

Government-sponsored summer employment programs will be somewhat changed this year by the recent elimination of the Opportunities for Youth program and the cutbacks to the Local Initiatives Program. The Ontario government program, Experience '76, and the federal government program, COSEP (Career-Oriented Summer Employment Program), will provide employment on the same scale as last year.

Students wishing to remain in Kingston this summer are advised by the Career Planning and Placement Centre to adopt an attitude of willingness to accept short-term jobs. Tourist industry-related jobs should be more plentiful this summer due to the Olympics but not all employers will be hiring for a four-month period to cover a rush or three to four weeks.

The AMS Job Bank and Canada Manpower will assist students in finding summer employment in the Kingston area.

One enterprising individual has found a way to move on ice without employing those tricky skates.

Distinguished Canadians coming to Queen's

"Canada: Towards the Year 2000" is the theme of the annual Chancellor Dunning Trust Lecture series to be held at Queen's. The five lectures will be held at Dunning Hall Auditorium beginning in January and continuing intermittently until February 9.

Canadian historian, Donald Creighton, will begin the series on Wednesday, January 14, speaking on "The Individual and the Welfare State." On Tuesday, January 20, Executive Director of the Ontario Arts Council, Louis Applebaum, and artist, Harold Town, will speak on "Creating a Climate for Creativity."

Senator Keith Davey and economist Eric Kierans will address the subject "The Canadian Economy" on Friday, January 30. Continuing on Friday, February 6, Stephen Lewis, Leader of the New Democratic Party of Ontario, and John White, former Ontario cabinet minister, will be speaking on "Humanizing Government Policy." The last lecture in the Dunning Series will be held on February 9, with "Official Languages in Canada" as the subject of the talk to be presented by Keith Spicer, Commissioner of Official Languages with the Government of Canada.

The Chancellor Dunning Trust was established in 1946 by an anonymous donor as a tribute to the Hon. Charles A. Dunning, former Chancellor at Queen's. It was the hope of the donor that the "inspiration of a life of public service will help future students to do their part in service to humanity."

Hand in the Housing surveys

A mail survey of off-campus student housing accommodation by the Campus Planning Office is still in progress. It started about the middle of November but was delayed due to the mail strike. The Campus Planning Office would like to encourage all of those living off-campus who still have their questionnaires to complete them as soon as they can and return them by Campus Mail to the office.

The purpose of the questionnaire is to obtain up-to-date information about housing accommodation for students in Kingston who live in non-University oriented housing. Everyone concerned with the problems which students face in finding suitable housing accommodation is most anxious to have this survey completed as soon as possible and approach a 100 percent response.

Anyone who still has an off-campus student housing survey questionnaire which was sent out in November is encouraged to take a few minutes to complete and return it.

Briefly...

Henderson Report discussion

David Warner, NDP MPP for Scarborough-Ellesmere and NDP critic of Colleges and Universities, will meet with Queen's students Monday, January 12 at 8p.m. in the fifth floor lounge of John Watson Hall to discuss the Henderson Report.

The Henderson Report is a paper commissioned by the Ontario government to determine those areas in which government spending may be reduced.

Mr Warner will be soliciting students' views on this proposed legislation. For further information, contact Susan Breau at 549-2482.

Queen's helps to conserve energy

Eight Ontario post-secondary institutions will participate this year in a $531,000 project to investigate ways of reducing energy consumption in campus buildings.

As part of the Ontario Government's Energy Management Program and co-ordinated by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, the various institutions will save an estimated $164,000 worth of energy yearly.

Under the project, savings will be monitored by means of highly specialized controls being installed in campus buildings. The results will be made available to physical plant personnel on a province-wide basis. This is a continuation of the other proposed conservation measures such as reduced lighting which involve little or no capital cost to the institutions.

Teaching committee needs people

Nominations are sought for one faculty and three student positions on the Teaching Award Committee for the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching. The award, which will consist of a certificate and a tax free sum of $1,000, will be presented annually to an outstanding teacher at Queen's.

The task of the Awards Committee will be to review the qualifications of each nominee, audit classes of those listed as finalists and recommend one candidate to the Alumni Association. The term of office will be for two years.

Nominations and applications for these positions should be forwarded to the Senate Office, Richardson Hall, no later than January 14, 1976.

Senate budget review committee has vacancies

Vacancies exist for three faculty and one student member on the Senate Budget Review Committee, for a term of office of two years commencing April 1st, 1976.

Full-time students in any year, and full-time faculty are invited to apply for these positions, and members of the university community are invited to submit to the Secretary of the Senate the names of those whose interests, knowledge and experience seem to qualify them for such positions. Nominees need not be members of the Senate, but should have a special interest in the particular problems related to the responsibilities of this Committee. It would be helpful to the Senate Nominating Committee, in selecting the most appropriate nominees, if the special interests and talents of applicants or prospective nominees were to be briefly described on the application form, which is available in the Senate Office. The Nominating Committee would also be willing to interview any prospective nominee who might wish to appear before it.

Applications should be submitted to the Senate Office before January 23, 1976.

Queen's Pranks

Terry Collins

The earliest recorded story dealing with student pranks at Queen's relates that the class of 1859 developed the "double barrelled, self regulating prod". The device consisted of two pins, embedded in a piece of wood which, when sat upon, would provoke great reactions from professors. The eight people in the class of '59 went on to become ministers (5), a judge, a doctor and a Public School Inspector.

University students everywhere have always had a reputation for being fond of capers and practical jokes. In this column and the next, I'll try to outline some of the more noteworthy pranks through the years, as documented by the Alumni Association.

In 1865, a pipe smoking gentleman known as "Cuddy B..." ran a boarding house on William Street. When the students went to classes, "Cuddy" would go around and nip shavings from their plugs of tobacco. Eventually, the students began locking their tobacco away. Cuddy then started smoking any unfinished pipefulls that he could find. "One day he found a large one nearly full and smoked dreamily for about three minutes until- "BANG" and Cuddy discovered about a half thimbleful of gun powder at the bottom, "marring pipe and features alike."

In the 1860's, the janitor's cow was frequently walked around campus by the students. One time it found itself in the belfry of the Old Medical Building.

Little is recorded of student mischief again until the 1920's. Charlie Pointin, a Queen's student, reportedly announced that he would be jumping out of a third floor window of the LaSalle Hotel. Having attracted a good crowd, Charlie pushed a life sized dummy out the window which landed on the street car wires below, knocking out the entire system. Kingston's street cars often displayed the Queen's colours on football weekends, and it is said that the havoc brought on the street cars by Queen's students may have speeded the city's decision to retire them when they did.

Charlie Pointin was involved in another notable incident in Toronto around this period. Apparently some of his friends tossed his cap out of a ninth floor window of the King Edward Hotel, and it landed on a ledge two stories below. Charlie, lowered by bedsheets, tried unsuccessfully to retrive his cap as his buddies, singing the 'Volga Boatmen', kept yanking him up just before he could grasp the hat. After about seven 'Yo Heave Ho's, the sheets began to give (Charlie was lowered delicately to the ledge.)

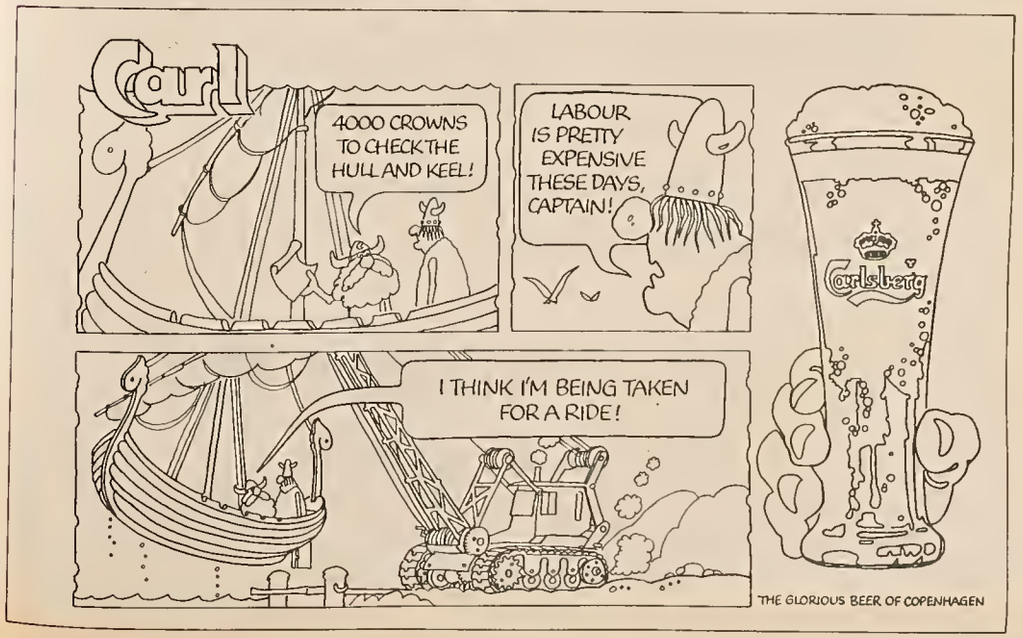
Sir John A's statue once wore a red face, blue pants and yellow cape as he greeted visiting Alumni back for Homecoming.



And so it goes...In the 1960's some of the pranks pulled by Queen's students had rather serious repercussions. RMC was victimized by a group of students who painted a large 'Q' in pink paint on the War Memorial Arch. The College was not amused at all and relations with Queen's were somewhat strained. Two years ago, thousands of dollars worth of damage was done to the foyer of Leonard Hall, the result of a prank. Piles of paper were used by some students to fill the room of an absent friend. The plot was discovered by a janitor and the papers removed downstairs. The bags of newsprint ignigted but, luckily, no one was injured in the blaze.

Queen's engineers have made a tradition of staging April Fool's surprises for the campus. In 1967 a car driven by engineers wearing Artsci jackets stalled in front of Ban Righ Hall. This obstructed the following car, filled with another group of engineers in yellow jackets. After a heated argument, the engineers got some hammers, picks and shovels from the back of their car and proceeded to demolish the Artsci's auto. They then picked it up, placed it on the grass, painted it yellow and drove away, much to the shock of the on looking lunch-goers.

Naturally, no review of Queen's pranks would be complete without at least mentioning Science '73's transformation of the Grant Hall clock into a giant replica of a Mickey Mouse watch, or the efforts of Science '76 in positioning a yellow volkswagon in a large tree on University Avenue last April 1.

Source material for this column was taken from the files of the Alumni Association. Our sincere thanks are extended to Mr. Murray Gill and Mr. Herb Hamilton for their assistance when producing this column.

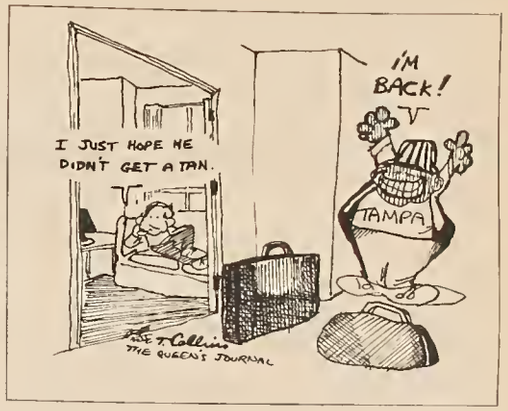
Prospects for '76

Gerry Lewarne

Too much time has been spent on radio and television looking back at 1975 so now it is time to look forward to 1976. By far the most newsworthy item in 1975 was Pierre Trudeau's new wage and price guidelines. On New Year's Day he heaped fuel on the fire of resentment which is smouldering in many Canadians. He said that the controls would be used to shape a new society in Canada which would not be so acquisitive. Needless to say this has caused a great deal of concern among Canada's business people and members of the federal Liberal caucus. A rumour is floating around that there is an opposition group forming within the caucus to deflect their fearless leader.

Trudeau and his advisors will not back down and there will continue to be rumblings of discontent and although there will not be an election called, there will be a few false alarms. Some foreign investment will leave Canada and the unemployment rate will rise making it difficult to find a summer job. Furthermore, there will be an increase in unemployment benefits "to allow the poor to keep up with inflation".



The government deficit will increase because the federal budget will increase by 15 percent which will cause an increase in the money supply, which in turn will cause inflation to be fueled up to about 16 percent.

However there will be a few bright lights in 1976. K-Tel records will continue to be the best record buy on the market and NHL hockey teams will improve ever so slightly because of the shellacking the Russians are giving us.

The PC leadership race is also a very newsworthy item with sixteen candidates in the race. However there are only five frontrunners. They are Flora MacDonald, Brian Mulroney, Claude Wagner, Sinclair Stevens, and, the most recent entry, Paul Hellyer. For my money, it will be either Paul Hellyer or Sinclair Stevens in the winner's circle because the Tories must return to their basic free-enterprise philosophy and those two men are the firmest in that philosophy.

Taking a short glance back at International Women's year, we can see that it was a failure and a dismal one at that. For instance, who were the four most talked-about women in 1975? Patty Hearst, Indira Ghandi, Sara Jane Moore, and Lynnette Fromme. Please girls, leave the terrorism to the men; we don't get caught as often.

In 1976, you will also have to do more work around your home. For instance you will have to house-train your dog again because he keeps doing his dirties on your new pet rock. Also you will have to scrub your floor harder this year because Trudeau's message will even get through to the dirt on your floor and they will begin to exercise restraint.

Your horoscope

T. Clairvoyant

Your Birthday Today: Waste no time in doing those things you would otherwise do on a day such as today. Be kind to your mother and don't use swear words.

Aries (March 21-April 19) Somebody is likely to come into contact with you today. Take a bath. Wear shoes.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) Look up at a tall building today and go into a tribal chant. Beware of policemen today.

Gemini (May 21 - June 20) Expenditures over two dollars today are a waste of money. Exercise Caution in your daily affairs. You are a child of the universe, no less than the moon and the stars.

Cancer We are flying at an estimated altitude of 12,000 feet. If you look to your left you will see a shoulder. Do not hold your breath in mixed company today.

Leo (July 23 - Aug 22) Take a Virgo for your lover today. If you pass GO collect $200.

Virgo (Aug 23 - Sept 22) Beware of strange Leos who offer you candy. Apply for a working visa in Puorto Valarta to raise pet rocks.

Libra (Sept 23 - Oct 22) Sleep in today. Buy a bottle of Chivas Regal, pour it out and say, "To hell with restraint". Laugh at the mirror.

Scorpio (Oct 23 - Nov. 21) People will greet you with the words "How's it goin?" today. Beat them up. They don't really like you.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Recent developments in your love life have led to thoughts of hopeless inadequacy. Too bad.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Ladies, do your sheets and pillowcases look yellow, dingy? Who cares? Sneak up on someone you like and tell them that they shouldn't eat french fries if they want to get rid of their zits.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20) Don't fly today under any circumstances. If you weren't planning to, book a flight and cancel out.

The Palestine Question

Zionism and the PLO

What is Zionism?

by Canadian University Press

What is Zionism? According to A.C. Forrest, who wrote a controversial book on the Palestine question in 1971 titled The Unholy Land, "Political Zionism is a philosophy which says that all Jews belong to one nation. They need a state of their own to secure their identity, to protect themselves from future outbursts of anti-Semitism, and to develop their culture and civilization. Israel is that state and it is the duty of all Jews to support Israel and, if possible, to go live in Israel."

Zionism, Forrest writes, is based on the premise that "the mere presence of Jews among Christians is an irritant which generated anti-Semitism, for which there can be no remedy. Therefore, the only way to solve this problem - the most important problem of the Jewish people throughout their history - is for Jews to leave the country of their residence and establish their own state in their historic homeland of Palestine."

Forrest continues to say that "Political Zionism was one of two Jewish movements which came into being in 1897. The other was the Socialist Bund. Zionism was a nationalistic movement of the middle class in Eastern Europe. The Bund came out of the poorer and working classes and reflected a very different ideology, for it was based on the very opposite concept - that anti-Semitism, which was real enough at that time, was not a mysterious or perennial evil."

The view of the Bund, Forest explains, is that "Anti-Semitism has its cause in the economic, political and psychological conditions of society and, like any other human evil, it can be cured by changing the conditions that brought it about. Accordingly, the Bund maintains that the Jewish problem is part of the general problem of mankind and can be solved only by the improvement of the lot of humanity as a whole, not by any special panaceas for Jews."

The forcible establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 marked a victory for the proponents of Zionism, but it did not put an end to the split among Jews and non-Jews over the question of Zionism. Today the split continues, both inside and outside Israel, and Canada has in recent months become the scene of a struggle between the Zionists and the representatives of the displaced Palestine people, the PLO, over whether the PLO will be allowed to get its side of the story out for North Americans to hear.

One Jewish organization in Canada which has been critical of Zionism and has supported the rights of the Palestinian people is the "Alliance of Non-Zionist Jews" founded last year in Toronto. The Alliance operated out of York University in Toronto and consists of student and non-student Jewish members.

UN resolves that Zionism is a form of racism

The General Assembly

Recalling its resolution 1904 (XVIII) of 20 November 1963, proclaiming the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All forms of Racial Discrimination and in particular its affirmation that "any doctrine of racial differentiation or superiority is scientifically false, morally condemnable (and) socially unjust and dangerous" and its expression of alarm at "the manifestations of racial discrimination still in evidence in some areas in the world, some of which are imposed by certain governments by means of legislative, administrative or other measures",

Recalling also that, in its resolution 3151G (XXVIII) of 14 December 1973 the General Assembly condemned inter alia the unholy alliance between South African racism and zionism,

Taking note of the Declaration of Mexico on the Equality of Women and their Contribution to Development and Peace proclaimed by the World Conference of the International Women's Year, held at Mexico City from 19 June to 2 July 1975, which promulgated the principle that "international co-operation and peace require the achievement of national liberation and independence, the elimination of colonialism and neo-colonialism, foreign occupation, zionism, apartheid, and racial discrimination in all its forms as well as the recognition of the dignity of peoples and their right to self-determination",

Taking note also of resolution 77(Xii) adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity held in Kampala from 28 July to 1 August 1975 which considered "that the racist regime in occupied Palestine and racist regimes in Zimbabwa and South Africa have a common imperialist origin, forming a whole and having the same racist structure and being organically linked in their policy aimed at repression of the dignity and integrity of the human being",

Taking note also of the Political Declaration and Strategy to strengthen International Peace and security and to intensify Solidarity and Mutual Assistance among Non-Aligned countries held in Lima, Peru from 25 to 30 August 1975, which most severely condemned zionism as a threat to world peace and security and called upon all countries to oppose this racist and imperialist ideology,

1. Determines that zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination.

PLO member explains resolution

OTTAWA (CUP)---"I was chased out of Israel because I am not a Jew - that is Zionism."

And that is why, according to Shafik Al-hout of the Palestine Liberation Organization, the UN condemned Zionism as "a form of racism and racial discrimination."

Al-hout, a native Palestinian born in Jaffa, told a partisan but divided audience in Ottawa on November 17 that Arabs and Jews "were living happy till the Zionist doctrine came to our land" and turned 800 thousand Arabs, including Al-hout, into refugees.

The Vice-Chairman of the PLO delegation to the UN, and a PLO executive member, Al-hout said the PLO is the "sole representative of the Palestinian people" and defended the PLO and UN position to a packed meeting at the Ottawa Public Library, organized by the Ottawa chapter of the Voice of Women.

"We represent the oppressed and are fighting for what has been taken from us by brute force, by real terror. We are freedom fighters and we identify ourselves with the national liberation movements of the world."

The Zionists, he contended, have been condemned by the progressive Third World and Developed countries, but "have best relations with the reactionary nations which have in the past practised anti-semitism", citing the US as the prime example.

What does the PLO want?

"But the will of the people is more important than the will of the reactionary forces", he said, predicting that the PLO and the Palestinian people would achieve "ultimate victory".

What does the PLO want? "We want to go back to Palestine and live in peace together with the Jews" Al-hout said. Israel must end its discrimination against the Arabs living in Palestine, and must "identify themselves with the area about them" rather than create a "Middle-East ghetto" of Jews.

Al-hout said the PLO will not accept any attempt to resolve the dispute by creating a separate state for the Palestinian Arabs. "We don't want to be settled anywhere except in our own land."

The question of the use of violence by the PLO in their struggle against Israel was repeatedly raised by pro-Israel members of the audience.

What about the killing of civilians? What about the violence at the 1972 Olympics? What about the hijacking of airplanes?

"You condemn hijacking a plane but you don't condemn hijacking a whole country," replied Al-hout. He did not deny that violence is a component of the PLO struggle, but stressed that Arabs are also the victims of Israeli violence.

"We are not the aggressors. Arab people are born tolerant. But this time there is not more tolerance ..There will be an everlasting struggle until we achieve complete victory."

Al-hout concluded his talk by asking Jews outside Israel "to play a role by voicing out that the only way to co-exist is to live in democracy despite religious differences."

Afterwards, at a local restaurant owned by an Arab Canadian, Al-hout told a largely pro-Palestinian audience "it is up to the Arab community and progressive forces in Canada to do something to create an even-handed policy on the part of the Canadian authorities."

He said the PLO "just wants to see Canada take an objective look at the Middle East situation" rather than blindly follow pro-Zionist policies.

Al-hout also predicted that the "Kissinger Plan" for peace in the Middle East, which he called "peace by pieces", would fail, and that Arab solidarity in support of the palestinian people would not be broken.

But negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, he said, are out of the question because the Israelis refuse to recognize the PLO as the legitimate representatives of the Palestinians, and because the PLO will not sit down and negotiate "as prisoners of war".

Again in response to questions about the use of violence involving civilians, he reiterated that it was a two-way street on that score.

Seven attempts have been made on his life, he said, including one last year when 10 mortar rockets fired by Israeli terrorists hit his offices in Beirut. "The building was filled with women and children. But you do not see that (in the west) because you are one-eyed children."

"Is that not violence?" he asked

Al-hout's message to the audience was to "tell all you find that the Palestinian people will not give up the struggle ... we will never leave."

The response was a standing ovation and chants of "Long Live Palestine!" and "Revolution And To Victory!"

...while Zionists demonstrate outside

While PLO spokesman Shafik Al-hout spoke inside the Ottawa public library November 17, about 150 demonstrators outside proclaimed their support for Zionism and their oppositions to allowing the PLO to present its case.

"I am a Zionist", "PLO Spells Murder"; "Hitler Also Killed Zionists"; and "Give Peace a Chance" read their placards.

Nobody would claim responsibility for organizing the demonstration. People who were identified as leaders but who refused to give their names to reporters claimed they were "just a cross-section of the community showing their concern."

In fact, many of the demonstrators were members or supporters of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council, who apparently organized the demonstration.

One demonstrator, when asked why the PLO were called "murderers" for their armed attacks while Israeli's who do the same thing are called "commandos" claimed the difference was that Israelis did not kill "wantonly".

"Precision bombing into a refugee camp for instance, is a difficult job. If you are off just a bit you hit a school or something," he explained.

The demonstrators circulated a leaflet which claimed that "anti-Zionism is but a euphemism for anti-semitism."

Canadian Immigration officials harass

by Charlotte McEwan for Canadian University Press

(Charlotte McEwan is Editor of Affairs of the Moment

A number of prominent Palestinians, intellectuals and diplomatic personnel, have been running into harrassment by Canadian Immigration officials when coming to speak in Canada. They have been followed everywhere and confined to very narrow lists of engagements.

Take the case of Dr. Hanna Nazir, president of the Birzeit College, a 50 year old internationally recognized institute of higher education on the occupied West Bank of the Jordan River.

Dr. Nazir came to Canada last May for discussion with church leaders about Israeli violations of basic human rights within the occupied territories through imprisonment without trial and arbitrary deportations. He was followed everywhere by immigration officials and told he should not have spoken to the Canadian Arab Federation because it was not "on his list of church groups".

Prominent Palestinians have been subjected to long interrogations at airports and allowed into Canada only under Ministerial Permits. When Dr. Fayex Sayegh, a distinguished Arab scholar and statesman came to Canada as guest of honour for the Canadian Arab Federation Annual Meeting he was detained and interrogated at the Toronto airport although he was carrying diplomatic passport as well as his United Nations documents.

This detention was questioned in the House of Commons by Heath McQuarrie (P.C. Hillsborough). On May 26th he asked the Minister of Immigration to investigate this regretable discourtesy to a respected personage and a friendly state.

Mr Andras replied that Dr. Sayegh had admitted to membership in the Palestinian Liberation Organization "This under Canadian law makes him a member of a prohibited class .. but under the Nicholson doctrine he was given a minister's permit for the express purpose of his visit to Toronto," he stated

Mr. McQuarrie then asked whether this indicated, "that all members of the PLO whether they be priests, clergymen, pacifists or what, are not admissable to Canada".

Mr. Andras replied, "The advice given by the Department of Justice is that the PLO is an organization, the membership of which are prohibited entry except under special permit."

Dr Sayegh himself has reported that in this interrogation he had stated that he was a member of the Palestine National Council of the PLO but not a member of one of the commando organizations.

He further reported that the interviewer read a section of a law which provided that advocacy of subversion of "democratic institutions" is a reason for barring an applicant unless under ministerial permit.

Dr. Sayegh finally accepted a ministerial permit after the officer made several phone calls to Ottawa, but only on the strict understanding that his acceptance did not imply that the Palestine Liberation Organization was engaged in "subverting a democratic institution", because Israel is not a democratic institution in his way of thinking.

On October 9th a distinguished Palestinian professor, Dr. Ibraham Abou Lughud of Northwestern University (US) who came to speak to students of Toronto University on "Palestinian Perspectives" following Moshe Dayan's talk on "Israel and the Big Powers", was also interrogated at the airport.

On June 12th a trade union leader "Palestine General Union of Palestinian Workers) was detained and interrogated for three hours. One of the questions hammered at him was "Where does Arafat live?" What has this to do with his entering Canada on a visit?

Back On the Air

"Good evening and welcome to the Guildhall Mystery Theatre". With that phrase the narrator, Leonard Judge ushered in the second season of the Queen's Drama Guild radio series, On the Air

Broadcasting this year with the cooperation of CKWS FM, the series will recreate the themes and style of the Golden Age of Radio. Partially written and directed by David N. Fanstone, the programmes will play on Saturday nights at six-thirty, beginning on January third.

Local actors featured in this years tapings will include Roger Dunn, Ann Hardcastle, Shelley Cavalier, Morrison Bock, Nancy Palk, Lois Lorrimer, Catherine Bronskill and Virginia Grieg. Music was created for the series by Eric Hughs, and production is by Alan Mann. Other script writers will include Michael Saver, Peter Palmer and Philip Tunnly. The programmes began last year in honour of the Queen's Drama Guild's seventy-fifth anniversary. The series of twenty half hour programmes will play through April, on CKWS, FM, 96.3, in Kingston, Ontario.

Dunning Hall concerts to climax

An evening with the Orford String Quartet, Gary Karr and Anton Kuerti promises to be one of the highlights of the 1975-76 music season. It is an opportunity to hear six exceptional musicians combine their individual talents for an exciting evening of chamber music.

The Orford String Quartet have dazzled audiences throughout the world. Absolute harmony of thought, spirit and virtuosity characterize the music and performance of this remarkable quartet.

The 1975-76 season marks the tenth anniversary of the Orford String Quartet. The members of the quartet are Andrew Dawes and Kenneth Perkins, violin, Terence Helmer, Viola, and Marcel St-Cyr, cello. Each member is a soloist in his own right.

Gary Karr is considered the greatest living virtuoso on the double bass, no mean achievement considering that only three other musicians have attained that recognition in the 250-year history of the instrument.

In the 250-year history of the double bass only four musicians have achieved recognition as Solo Bass Virtuoso. They are Domenico Dragonetti (1763-1846), Giovanni Bottesini (1831-1889), the renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky (1874-1951) and the Los Angeles-born Gary Karr, who is considered the greatest living virtuoso on the string bass. Olga Koussevitzky presented Karr with her husband's 360 year old Amati in recognition of this virtuosity.

During the past two and a half centuries, no major composer had written a concerto or sonata for the double bass. Karr's awesome technique has inspired such leading composers as Hans Werner Henze, Gunther Schuller, Alec Wilder, Alexander Brott and Malcolm Arnold to write works especially for him.

Anton Kuerti is an outstanding pianist whose repertoire includes all the concertos of Beethoven, Brahms and Chopin. He has performed the complete 32 Beethoven sonatas and the Diabelli Variations and is presently recording the shole cycle.

Anton Kuerti is not only an outstanding concert pianist who has appeared frequently with many of the world's great orchestras and conductors, he is also a dedicated musician and an individualist. His attempt to master many of the works of a particular composer in order to interpret the music as it was meant to be played, is just one example of his dedication.

This kind of dedication does not mean that Kuerti sees himself as a super star with a mission. Quite the contrary. He is earthbound and casual, tunes his own piano which he often transports in an especially built van. He refuses to increase his fees to meet the demand, anxious to develop his own personality and insure his artistic growth, without sacrificing either to please the politics of the box office or the whims of concert managers and even audiences. His repertoire consists of works that are not necessarily as popular as the Tchiakovsky and Rachmaninoff piano concertos but are nevertheless worthy of being played and enjoyed.

Anton Kuerti is pleased with the progress of his career and with his involvement in education as Artist-in-Residence at the Faculty of Music, University of Toronto

The five-city tour, coordinated by the Touring Office of the Canada Council will take place in January 1976 and will bring the six musicians to Ottawa, Kingston Deep River, Toronto and Belleville. Their program will consist of works by Bach, Dvorak and Schubert. The Kingston concert is scheduled for Monday, January 12 at 8:30 in Dunning Hall. Tickets are available from the Performing Arts Office, 547-5786.

Drama contests for New Year

David Helwig, literary manager of CBC-TV's drama department today announced the second TV drama writing contest for students. "We were so pleased with the results of last year's contest which uncovered new writing talent, that we've decided to continue to seek out new writers this way," Helwig said. Both Michael J. Silvani of Toronto and Richelle Kosar of Regina, last year's first and second prize winners are currently working on commissioned scripts of the CBC-TV drama department.

The search is for one-hour scripts for videotape production, not for film scripts Contestants must be Canadian citizens or landed immigrants registered at a Canadian university or community-technical college during the 1975-76 school year. Scripts entered in the contest must be clearly typed and must be postmarked no later than June 30, 1976. All scripts will be acknowledged, but critical comment will not be offered.

First prize is $1,000; second prize is $750; third prize is $500. This payment will be considered to give the CBC a twelve-month option on the Canadian television rights to the winning scripts. Should the CBC decide to purchase and produce any of these scripts, the purchase will be made under the terms of the CBC-ACTRA agreement.

The judging panel making the final selection will consist of John Hirsch, head of TV drama; David Helwig, literary manager TV drama; and Bena Shuster, dramaturge of the Tarragon Theatre and director of the Tarragon Writers' Workshop The decisions of the judges will be final.

All manuscripts and requests for further information should be addressed to: College Writing Contest, CBC-TV Drama Dept., Box 500, Stn. "A", Toronto, Ontario. M5W 1E6

for women:

The Playwrights Co-op is honoured to announce that it has been awarded a grant from the Ontario Arts Council (from the International Women's Year Fund) to co-ordinate a women's playwriting competition. The play must be written by women and must have women as their central characters.

Submissions may be one act or full-length comedy, drama, revue...submit double-spaced typewritten scripts with stamped return-addressed envelopes. Playwrights may send more than one play. Do not send your only copy of the plays.

The plays will be numbered to assure anonymity.

Each play will be read by professional women in Canadian Theatre. A full report on each script will be sent to the playwright after January 31st. This critical report and discussions with the judges will be the basis upon which five to eight plays will be chosen.

The best plays will be chanelled to productions through direct promotion and by publication. The plays will first be published by the Co-op in its "playscript" format. Synopsis of the plays will be sent to every artistic director in the country. .ten copies to the author...the plays will be included in the Playwrights Co-op National Playlist, a quarterly of critical evaluations which is circulated to professional and amateur groups, universities, the C.B.C. and to the Guthrie Theatre in the U.S.A. Ultimately, the plays will appear in a paperback anthology of plays by Canadian Women.

The judges are directors, producers and dramaturges; women who are the second link in the professional chain of theatre. They make theatre happen in this country.

The competition is specifically designed to introduce and integrate more women writers into Canadian Theatre...and ultimately to produce more challenging roles for Canadian actresses.. new plays for directors to plug into...to give us all as women in theatre, a stronger and surer footing in the professional theatre network.

Send scripts to:

Dance Show Cancelled

Due to an unfortunate accident in New York, in which Murray Louis received an injury, the scheduled performance of the Murray Louis Dance Company here in Kingston on Tuesday, January 13 has been cancelled. Since Murray Louis is the main dance in the troupe, the Canadian tour has had to be postponed indefinitely.

It is impossible to arrange a performance for the same evening of another dance company of equal stature, so the Performing Arts Office is attempting to do so for another date during January and February.

In the meantime, the Performing Arts Office asks all patrons to retain their tickets for the Murray Louis Dance Company as these tickets will be honoured as admission and seat location for this new event.

WIC-ly

The goal of the Women's Intramural Committee is encouragement of widespread participation in recreational sports. To achieve this end, WIC offers to Queen's women the opportunity to play any number of sports and provides basic skill instruction in each sport (usually in the form of a clinic at the beginning of a tournament). WIC is also running a competitive level basketball league this year, on a trial basis (This is being run in addition to the recreational WIC basketball programme). Plans are under way for a volleyball league with a similar format.

To further encourage participation in intramural sports, WIC has instituted a new point and award system. Under this system, an individual has the option of participating for faculty-year group, residence group or a group of friends.

January has been designated WIC Publicity Month. It is hoped that Queen's women will take the time this month to find out what WIC has to offer. Some of the sports beginning in January are snowshoeing, cross-country, skiing, squash, jogathon, curling, co-ed badminton, hockey, volleyball and paddleball.

For more details, come to Athletic Night this Thursday (January 8) from 7:00pm to 8:00pm in Bews Gym or contact: Anne Brown 544-4268, Maureen Lisle (Director) 547-5939, or Deb Geisel (Co-ordinator, Publicity Month) 549-5792.

Queen's Frank Tindall was honoured by the City of Kingston on Monday December the 15th when he was awarded the Honnurary achievement Award. Mayor Speal made this presentation in the City Council Chambers to Tindall as well as to two other prominent Kingstonians; Syl Apps and Whipper Billy Watson. The ceremonious occasion was preceded by a reception in Memorial Hall.

Bews News For Youse

Paul Findlay

Welcome back to the new term. The next couple of weeks will see the following team sports commence: Ball Hockey, Basketball, Curling, Waterpolo and 10-Pin Bowling. Of course, Hockey and Broomball are continuing. If you want to get involved in any of these sports, let your athletic stick know. If you don't know who he is, come into Room 102 A of the Phys. Ed. Centre and leave a note in his mailbox. Entry sheets for Badminton Singles and Doubles, Handball Singles and Doubles and Table Tennis are all posted in the locker room of the Phys. Ed. Centre. Badminton and Handball Singles have an entry deadline of today. Free Throw entry sheet will be posted shortly.

This weekend, the Interfaculty Hockey Tournament will be played. Three games will be played Friday evening starting at 7:30. The remainder of the games will be played on Saturday starting at 12:30. The finals will be played at 8:30. A schedule of games will be posted in the lower lobby of the Phys. Ed. Centre. Since the Hockey Gaels are away, this tournament will give you an opportunity to see some good Hockey action this weekend.

My last column did not have all the results of the Tournament Sports from last term. Isreal Barsky of Education was the Paddleball Champion. Adelio De Monte and Ronald Van De Merwe of Engineering Grads took the Doubles Crown. Blair Baldwin of Arts '77 took the Squash Singles crown to go with his Doubles win in combination with Adrian Devlin. Bob O'Doherty of Commerce '78 won the Tennis Singles Tournament.

Recreation League Basketball is a new activity this year. It is intended for all male students and staff who don't want to play City League or Bews but enjoy playing basketball. It will be run along the lines of the Rec. League Hockey; the emphasis is on participation. Games will be played on Sunday between 6 and 10 p.m. So if you want to play, get some friends together and enter your team in Room 102 A by noon on Monday the 12th. There will be a managers meeting on Tuesday at 6:30 in Seminar A of the P.E. Centre

The Bews standings have been brought up to date with the addition of points from many of the tournament sports. Commerce '76 has passed Arts '77 in their nip-and-tuck battle for 1st place. There is a tight three-way battle for 5th place among Civil-Math, Law '77 and Arts '76.

Hockey Gaels take Tourney

Question: What does Kingston have that Ottawa doesn't appear to have?
Answer: Reasonably consistent refereeing.

The above was most obvious Friday night at the Ottawa Invitational Tournament when the Golden Gaels took on the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees in a league game. The official handed out 134 minutes in penalties - 62 to Ottawa and 72 to Queen's. Despite being short-handed a good deal of the way through the game the Gaels managed to beat the Gee-Gees 3-1.

The Ottawa squad has changed their style of play considerably since the last time they visited Kingston. They now employ a tight checking system but they are no Philadelphia Flyers. In the first period however, the Gaels had a few adjustment problems and fell behind 1-0. By the end of the period the Gaels had gotten the lead 2-1. Those first period goals came from Dougie Grills assisted by Mike Haramis and from J.C.Cerre assisted by Timmy Hanson and Steven Gross. Hanson had a partieularly good night, skating with typical grace and beauty and hustling beyond the call of duty.

The Gaels elosed the scoring in the third period on a goal by Ned McIntyre, set up by Bill White. Queen's goaltending was, again without equal. Clyde Harris faced 42 shots eompared to 27 by Ottawa's Jacque Martin, yet was able to stop 41 of those 42 shots. Saturday the Gaels faeed the McMaster Marlins, a team that previously beat them 8-4, in the finals of the tournament.

After a scoreless first period the Gaels came alive in the second with a pair of goals by Willie Wing. Haramis and Grills assisted in the first while Earl Moulton and Haramis gave the help in the second. For Mac, Tinney scored to make it 2-1 for the Gaels.

Steve Aubrey scored from Geoff Arnoldi and Rico Carty to make the total 3-1 for the Gaels. Mac managed to narrow the margin to 3-2 on a power play goal by Kalotinis and the game appeared as if overtime was a possibility. Mae didn't have it in them however and Dougie Grills scored on the open net, assisted by Aubrey and Haramis to give the Gaels the Championship by a 4-2 count.

As is tradition at the tournament an All-Star team was chosen and two Queen's men made it. Willie Wing played tough all weekend, both with the puck and with his body. If the former Hamilton Red Wing star continues as he did on the weekend the Toronto Maple Leafs just might want to be taking another look at him next season.

Our other All-Star was the 'Camel' Harris. There just aren't words to describe the way that Clyde played. Let it suffice to say that his performance was unbelievable. A couple of other players deserve mention. Mike Haramis, while he didn't pot one himself, had four assists and played like a pro both nights. Grills played smart hockey and got 2 goals and an assist in reward for his efforts. Others who deserve mention for good play are Steve Aubrey, Mike Flatters, especially for his play Friday; Kevin Tracy and John Cerre who appears to be moving the puck much better than in the first half of the schedule. In the fight department, Bill White gets a gold medal in the heavy weight division for really taking it to an Ottawa punching bag Friday night.

The Gaels finish in their division will depend heavily on the results of next weekends games that will be played in Toronto. Friday they face their toughest competition to date against U of T. Saturday they travel to the Ice Palace on the Steeles to take on York. It would be nice to bring back four points but let's not be unrealistic. Getting two from York would help a lot and I'm calling the Gaels to do just that. McMaster did manage to beat the mighty Blues this year, so with any luck, maybe we can too!

Clyde Harris, Queen's All-Star goalie, played superbly in nets during the Ottawa Tournament over the vacation. Queen's other All-Star was crowd favourite Willie Wing, who scored two quick goals to break McMaster's spirit early in the final game.

New Year's Resolutions: Dan will find more staff. Sarah will write more and more and more. Nick will buy us an electric typewriter. John will stay later on pressnights when we need him. Terry will agree with Sarah. Peter Haworth will show up on pressnights. David will write miles of beautiful feature copy. Nancy will have all the news edited, counted and with trial headlines ready by 5pm pressnight (which will be a first in Journal history). Alan will buy a trenchcoat and start sleuthing. Lyn will explore the locker rooms. Barb will train some science writers in her own golden ways. Giles will learn to type. Fenela will have a graceful 'freestyle' for us every two weeks. Mike will stay away from our news people at compendium time. Peter Case will fill our paper with prize winning shots. Betsy will bake cookies for every pressnight and will help with assignments and pressnight. Klaus will take pictures of us and make Mike eternalize us all. FUD will do even more combined reporting and picture taking; and John Morris will mend his evil ways, and never again let thoughts of young women enter his head, and Robin will continue to tolerate Thursdays. To everyone who has helped, and to those who plan to. Cheers for '76!

It is with a cold and post-nasal drip that this column is written. What a horrendous state of life, coughing, blowing your nose and sinus headaches.

But there is some good news. Only thirty five Hebrew classes left, and only three months till spring, and we got a hand woven macrame wall hanging from a favorite cousin, and it is now on our livingroom wall. For upperclassmen, second term is the most anxious time of the year. Finals, and for many of us, graduation is only months away. Thankfully ski week comes along five weeks from today, and that always helps to cure the February doldrums.

Prime Minister Trudeau told us more about his New Society, and he didn't even comment on Carol Taylor's hairdo, in his year end interview with Canada's private TV network. Trudeau appears to envisage a society with a radically different value system than with which we currently operate our economic system. Although he pointed out that many of the 'new values' are not really new, but rather not being used in our present system. The Prime Minister noted that we weren't a 'sharing' people, and that there isn't much 'brotherly love' left in this society. These are dynamic proposals, but the selfishness of the labour movement, and the business community will, no doubt, quickly make sure that people forget this silly suggestion of 'caring for others'.

Oh well...Sydenham Ward (the student ward) has a new alderman, Mr. Terry French. He tried to win the last municipal election on Keith Norton's coat-tails, and lost, but when Norton became our MPP, City Council filled the vacancy with the honorable Mr. French. He has served on the County Board of Education, and has a long personal association with radio station CKLC. To put it mildly, French is solid Kingston establishment, and he has a strong interest in the affairs of Queen's due to the fact that he is a member of our Board of Trustees. French has two problems, one is that he doesn't live in the ward he represents, and secondly, he has trouble associating with the transient student population who make up a large portion of the ward. If French adopts student causes as his own, you can be assured that with his 'power' position in city affairs, much will be done to improve the students' conditions in Kingston. Only time will tell whether French can effectively represent students, and if he cannot, there should be no hesitation in throwing him out of office in this fall's municipal election.

The Hamilton Spectator has declared 1976 to be International Men's Year, and in answer to the IWY slogan of "Why Not?", the slogan "Because" has been adopted for IMY. Therefore, I will officially open nominations for Queen's Male Chauvinist Pig of the Year until 5:00 p.m., Friday, January 23, 1976. Nominations should be dropped off in the Journal or AMS Office. The winner, to be selected by a panel of over-sexed females, will be announced on January 30th, P.S. I'm serious about this!

Thanks to all those who sent Christmas cards our way, and as usual the holiday was too short, but it's good to be back. These thoughts for the first column of the New Year are dedicated to Ms. Kim Springsted of Rocky U.

Crowns and thorns

A crown to the Buffalo Sabres of the NHL for supplying us with faint hope that the calibre of professional hockey is not as poor as we like to think.

A thorn to the girl I passed on the way to class who was in the midst of proclaiming to her friend that her fur coat was 'only muskrat'. Fur sales are at an all time high according to TIME mag. (I wonder how $525-million translates into helpless, bloody little 'creatures dying from a severe loss of skin and fur).

A crown to Sue Bolton and Howard Pearce of the Queen's Rec Committee for creating a superb sports skills program and involving over 1500 students (as of Tuesday's second term sign-up) in varied physical fitness programs which cost little but are greatly rewarding to the individuals participating.

A thorn to the guy in my Geography class who in great disregard to his fellow students, and the NO SMOKING sign in front of the class lit up a cigarette. I hope he enjoyed it—the people around him did not.

Macbeth review

Dear Editors:
An actual copy of Alain Casavant's review of the McArthur College production of Macbeth reached us only today. We find it difficult to believe such a poor excuse for journalism was allowed to be printed in your paper. A good journalist should recognize the ill manners, not to mention the danger, in misquoting out of context, and admitting it.

In defense of Bayridge students who have been labelled "one third of the rowdiest, inconsiderate, and ignorant students I've (Mr. Casavant) yet to see or hear", we feel it necessary to say that those "rowdy" students were a very small fraction of the Bayridge group who on the whole responded well.

The ease with which Mr. Casavant slaps on labels is only one indication of his illogical thinking. One experience with a few rowdy students at a play is certainly not an indication of "exactly what the present educational system is capable of, and is, producing".

The very important thing we all learned from this is that live theatre is something very much removed from the experiences of a sixteen year old to whom television and movies have taught apathetic passivity rather than subjective involvement. There is very much educating to be done here by teachers, institutions like McArthur and Queens, parents and the public. The best way to learn about theatre is to have the opportunity to experience it, which is something this production offered.

How could you publish a quotation from the Merchant of Venice as a caption for a picture of Macbeth? If the poor journalism, misquotation, and total lack of correct fact didn't merit a response, Mr. Casavant's lack of sensitivity to Shakespeare certainly does. In one paragraph he praises the "traditional production" but calls "bleeding heads" and "staircase swordfights", which are truly Shakespeare and very traditional, "gimmicky" and "corny". There is no excuse for the rude ill manners of the students but it seems they were merely exemplifying in their own crude way the same incapacity for "a willing suspension of disbelief" that Mr. Casavant shows when he calls a brilliant set "distracting". If he feels "stark colours and shape" do not add to the "mood of the play" then he certainly does not understand Macbeth.

The eyes in the back of Mr. Casavant's head must have been working as inefficiently as his flapping ears or he would have seen a good deal of "flinching" behind him. At least Mr. Casavant was consistent; both we and Shakespeare were misquoted and misunderstood.

Yours truly,
S. Cond R. O'Farrell

Why not cans?

Dear Editors
One Friday night last term while attending the Queen's hockey game, I couldn't fail to notice how thorough the A.M.S. constables were at relieving people of beer cans both at the door and in the stands. While agreeing that bottles should not be allowed in the arena due to possible breakage, I fail to see the point with beer cans. I would have agreed that they might possibly be thrown onto the ice or even amongst the crowd, but since coke in the can can be purchased in the arena, I fail to see the logic. If the AMS constables fear cans being thrown, then perhaps they should do something about the availability of coke cans. I know there has to be a logical explanation, as there always is with questions concerning the A.M.S. I just fail to see it. Perhaps I could be enlightened?

I visited a friend over the holiday and found him almost buried beneath a pile of greeting cards. He was frantically scrawling his name across each one and throwing it at his wife. She put it in an envelope and threw it to her brother. He scrawled an address on it from a very large book of addresses. The whole process moved like clockwork, only faster.

When I finally got him stopped I asked him what he was doing.

"I'm mailing out Christmas cards, of course."

"Do you know so many people?"

"No. These are all office people, third cousins, and people we met on shopping lines."

"Well, why are you sending them cards?"

"Because if we don't, they won't send any to us next year."

"And you like to get Christmas cards?"

"No. Most of them are from office staff and third cousins and people we met on the edge of the Grand Canyon in '63. And they're all signed 'Merry Xmas from T and M', whoever they are."

I was lost. I thought for a while and then ventured: "Isn't a Christmas card supposed to be a messenger of true brotherly love?"

"Yeah, but I hate it. Listen. I only send cards because I have to. If I didn't everyone I know would look down on me for a year. Social pressures dictate that I send out thousands of nice cards every year to people I don't know. If I thought I could get away with it I would send out cards saying: 'May your house burn to the ground and Happy New Year' but if I did I'm sure the FBI would be after me. They keep a file on people who don't send cards, you know. Anyone who is caught not sending enough cards is sentenced to a month of reading the messages on the inside of Mother's day cards.

I left and bought a whole bunch of cards.

Nancy Bnwes

It was indeed the night of nights. Residence lounges and common rooms hosted intimate wine and cheese parties. Women were dressed in clinging, floor-length gowns; the men were in suits and ties. Five different rooms were decorated for the event. The cause of all the fuss? Wanderlust VI.

The semi-formal dance is organized annually by the Women's Residence Council and the Inter-Residence Council.

Grant Hall reverberated to the brass sound of Future Shock, an eight-piece band. The room was festooned with crepe paper streamers and balloons. A mural at the back of the stage depicted a futuristic scene.

Upper Ban Righ Dining Hall was decorated with crossed swords, playing on the words of the theme, night of nights. Party-goers were invited to take their refreshments in the Upper Dining Room after dancing in the Lower Dining Room. Decorations on a "Winter Wonderland" theme were hung in the Lower Dining Room. The bluegrass sound of Coyote filled the room.

A huge banner welcome the Journal reporter to Hollywood, but the camouflage could not fully disguise the Lower Vic Common Room. There, Nickel played rock and roll to the obvious delight of the dancers.

In Leonard Cafeteria, a banner proclaimed "All Night – All Knights." The dance floor filled up immediately when Terry Dee and his group started singing top forty tunes such as "Love Will Keep Us Together" and "Laughter in the Rain."

The prize for decorations, however, would have to go to the organizers of the Cafe Casablanca in the basement of Morris hall. Posters of Humphrey Bogart and honky-tonky barroom scenes enlivened the walls. Red and white tablecloths graced the tables set with candles in wine bottles. Terry Collins, Steve Fromstein, Pat Jackman, Chris George and Jim Gillis entertained at the coffee house in one-hour shifts.

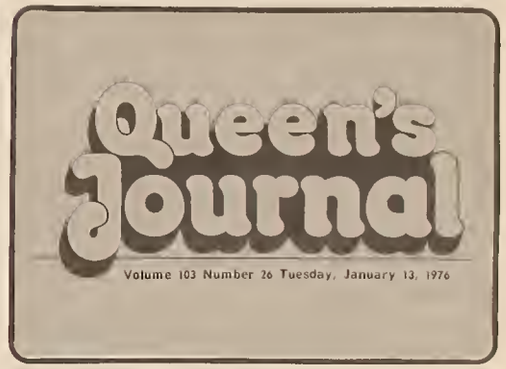
The Journal asked a young couple, obviously not attending Wanderlust, why not: "For me, it was monetary reasons." The tickets cost $9.50 per couple.

The night of nights is over for another year, when the planning, decorating and dressing-up will begin again.

Strike won't hurt standards here

Sarah Yarnell

As the strike of Metro Toronto high school teachers enters its ninth week, several Queen's students are concerned that 100-level courses next year will have to include some Grade Thirteen content. Harry Sterne, Queen's Assistant Registrar, has said that there will be no drop in the standards expected of first year students, and that the strike will not affect the quality of education at Queen's.



Sterne said that he hopes that once the strike ends, the students would be able to do "a fair amount of catching up," in order to be ready for university. Problems facing students planning to attend university next year will depend on how long the strike continues, he said.

Once the students admitted to Queen's enter the university, many of their difficulties may be solved with careful placement and course sectioning, explained Sterne. He pointed out that there already exists an extended programme for first year Applied Science students whose high school background in some subjects has not been sufficient. Also, many departments, such as mathematics, offer several different courses at the first year level.

Admitting the Metro students is another problem, Sterne explained that the university will look at a student's marks from Grades Eleven and Twelve, and will try to get an indication of the student's progress in Grade Thirteen. "We don't want to penalize students from Toronto, but we also have to be scrupulously fair in our selection of students," he said.

Sterne remarked that "judgment and not a computer" is used to determine admissions. Decisions to admit students are made on an "individual basis" which Sterne said he felt was fortunate in the case of the Metro students.

Sterne said that the Ministry of Education will only grant a credit if 110 - 120 hours are spent by the student on the course. This will present a problem for students seeking a graduation diploma this spring. The students whose schools operate on the semester system will be the worst affected, he predicted. Sterne said he could not say whether Queen's would admit a Metro student who was unable to earn his diploma because of the strike.

Proposal made to elect editor

Outer Council members and staff of the Queen's Journal will have a greater part in choosing the editor of the Journal if proposed by-law changes are approved by Outer Council members.

The Journal editor would be elected by Journal staff members and approved by Outer Council if changes to By-law 12 of the AMS constitution are passed. The proposal goes to a meeting of Outer Council on Thursday night for first reading.

Traditionally, the Journal editor, business manager and the Tricolor editor are chosen by a nine member selection committee made up of the current Journal editor, business manager and one staff representative; the Tricolor editor and one staff representative; and the in-coming and out-going AMS Vice-Presidents (Operations) and Services Commissioners.

This committee was invalidated this year when the position of Services Commissioner was erased by Outer Council, and the Journal business manager became a salaried AMS employee hired by the AMS business administrator. As a result of these changes, the AMS has no constitutional way of choosing the Journal and Tricolor editors until a new method, such as the one proposed, is approved.

The move away from a selection process was suggested because all other large Canadian student newspapers employ this method successfully, said Dan McClelland, chairman of the committee responsible for the proposal. A staff election is the best way of ensuring that a candidate for the Journal editorship will have staff support the following year, he explained. Also, as staff have a fundamental role in determining editorial policy, they should have a say in who their editor is going to be argued McClelland.

In order to be able to vote, each staff member will have to have contributed either four articles or four photographs since the first issue in September 1975, or will have to have helped with layout or typing. Promotional articles sent to the Journal by organizations and interest groups would not be considered contributions.

McClelland estimated that over 40 students would be eligible to vote, under this proposal.

A voters list would be published in the Journal prior to the election, according to the proposal. An all-candidates meeting would be held, and candidates' platforms and photographs would be published free in the Journal.

"All ordinary members of the Alma Mater Society" are eligible to run for the editorship, according to the proposal. Candidates would be able to nominate themselves, and no signatures would have to accompany the nominations.

The committee responsible for the proposal was struck at the last meeting of Outer Council in December 1975. Its members were Journal editors Dan McClelland and Sarah Yarnell, Tricolor editor Michael Kingsbury, Journal associate editors Terry Collins and John Bottomley, Theology student Brian Copeland, McArthur representative Douglas Bonnell, AMS President Ian Nordheimer and Vice-President (Operations) Paul Steep.

The Tricolor editor would be selected by a four member committee consisting of the current Tricolor editor, one staff representative, and two members of Outer Council appointed by the Council.

It was never my intention to lean on the commercial aspect of our business in this series. However, at several recent public colour printing demonstrations a very blunt question has been asked. "Why is Durst equipment so much more expensive than other brands?" To fully appreciate the reasons for price difference we must refresh our understanding of the true function of an enlarger.

Any enlarger performs one major function: that of taking a small negative or slide and magnifying it into a print of the required size. This may be anything from album-size to a wall mural. Print quality depends on efficiency of the lighting system and correct alignment of negative carrier and lens system. When these two all-important components function poorly the end result suffers. The question is, what do you look for to make sure that every possible enlarger benefit is working for you. Notice that I use the word benefit, not feature. If you analyze a "feature" list, many of the facts listed mean nothing at all when translated to terms of what they do to create a better enlargment.

First, is the enlarger steady? Is the column rigid enough to support the head steadily, and designed to allow turning of the head to project on a wall or even the floor when you want a bigger print than can be done on the baseboard. Is the elevating mechanism firm enough to permit easy raising and lowering yet hold the head in a fixed position during printing? As to the lamphouse itself, how is it constructed? On a Durst it will be either a one-piece casting or stamped rigid metal. If the unit has bellows are they plate-riveted in place or only glued? Are the lamphouse and mounting plate held together securely? Is the negative carrier an integral part of the lamphouse assuring perfect alignment with the light path? Can you adjust the lamp vertically and horizontally to compensate for flaws within the bulb itself? While we're on the lamp, with Cibachrome taking its place in the amateur darkroom the need for bright, efficient illumination becomes more important as this superb material is slower than presently existing colour printing paper. Thinking colour automatically raises the question of a colourhead. Two of our lower priced units do not accept this, but all Durst enlargers have a filter drawer as standard equipment. Can you change negative formats quickly and easily? Are accessory negative carriers and condensors available? Is the lens-mount standard? Do you need a compact unit that disassembles easily? The "take-apart" unit for portability and easy storage was created many years ago by Durst.

In a nutshell, look for an enlarger designed with top quality printing in mind. Don't be sidetracked by fancy design and "gimmicks". For a preview of the Durst enlarger family drop me a line. My nine-step Darkroom Chart will show you how easy it is to be a blow-up expert, and you'll also receive a brochure on darkroom accessories by the Paterson people, who also believe that equipment should be designed for use, not used for their design.

Campus Comment

The Senate, at its meeting of December 18, 1975, passed the following motion: that smoking be permitted in teaching areas during teaching time only by unanimous consent of students and faculty concerned. The Journal asked Queen's students their opinion on this ruling.

Interviews by Fredericka Birke, photos by Milo

"If smoking affects your health, you have every right to put up your hand and complain," sated Brian Young (History '77). "It's your air as much as anyone else's." The complaining of one is enough for all to stop smoking in class, was Brian's general opinion.

Diana Droog (Rehab '79) admitted, "This method is definitely a step in the right direction." Diana felt this was a more democratic way of dealing with the smoking problem.

Kerry Wood (Artsci '79) commented, "I don't smoke, yet someone should be entitled to smoke if they want to." Kerry admits that smoking creates a problem in small, poorly ventilated rooms, but suggested the sectioning of most teaching areas into smokers and non-smokers as a possible solution.

Perhaps Bob Turner (Geological Engineering '77) expressed the general viewpoint of most interviewed: "I agree with the principle of the Senate ruling, but feel it will be ineffective since initiatives will not be taken." Non-smokers, according to Bob, are generally not vocal enough to consistently make their feelings heard. "It's always too easy to say nothing."

At Queen's Park

AMS joins OFS mass rally to protect gov't financing

Giles Gherson ..and Bob Reynolds

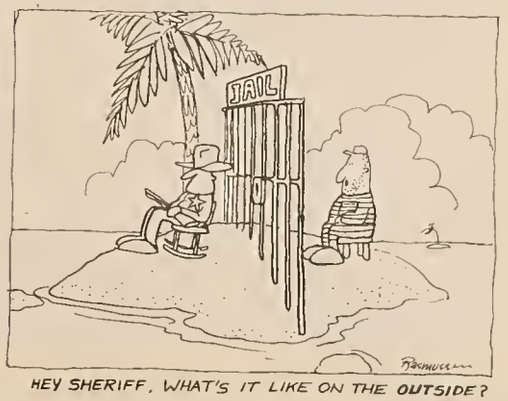
The motion "that Outer Council agree to participate in the OFS-FEO mass meeting in Toronto on January 21, to protest the McKeough Report" was adopted by Outer Council last Thursday night. They thereby endorsed one of the most crucial stages of the OFS financial strategy, which was formulated at the federation's fall conference, held at Queen's last September.

At that time it was stressed that enthusiastic participation by students in a mass meeting would encourage the minority government to reject the recommendations of its Green Paper on government financing of post-secondary education in Ontario.

In conjunction with the mass meeting, OFS representatives will deliver a brief to the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott, in opposition to Chapter 7 of the McKeough Report. They will also meet with leaders of the two opposition parties at Queen's Park.

Students participating in the mass meeting will initially assemble at the University of Toronto's Convocation Hall to discuss the issue of accessibility to post-secondary education with speakers representing the OFS and organized labour. Students will then proceed to Queen's Park for the presentation of the OFS brief.

In his speech to Outer Council, Peter Lane, External Affairs Commissioner, sought to show that many of the recommendations of the McKeough Report were "directly contrary to AMS or OFS policy". In outlining the rationale behind the mass meeting, Lane referred to the recommendations made in Chapter 7 which deals with post-secondary education. For example, the first recommendation made by the Report calls for "the Government (to) lift its control on tuition fees and allow universities and colleges...to determine the appropriate fee levels." Lane was concerned that as a result, accessibility to universities would be considerably diminished. As Lane pointed out, "By this Report, tuition will be around $1,000 by 1979."



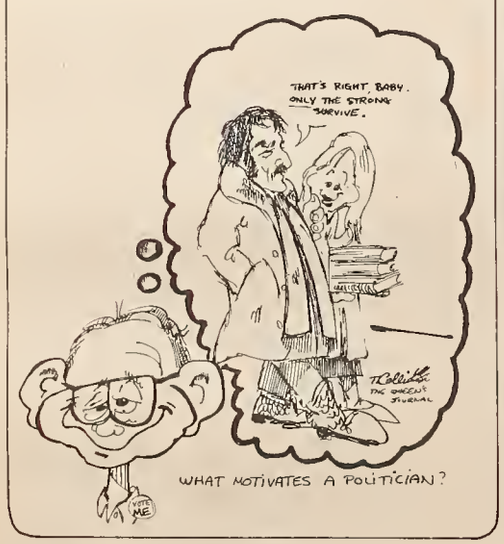
Another major concern is Article 7.11 of the Report which advocates the establishment of a bursary program, "...to recognize both academic achievement and financial need, so that any barriers to outstanding students from low-income families would be removed." Lane asserted that this involved the incorporation of a double standard, as average students from advantaged families would be able to attend university but only "outstanding" students from low-income families would be able to attend. As Lane stated, "the economically disadvantaged would become the academically disadvantaged."

Lane mentioned that another disincentive to students from lower income families is found in recommendation 7.8 which suggests that "the maximum provincial grant be decreased from $3,200 to $2,200 and the loan portion be increased from $800 to $1,800." Lane asserted that if the recommendation became policy, "students would end up with a phenomenal debt."

The allocation of funds by the Outer Council for the purpose of supplying transportation to the mass meeting is expected to encourage students to participate. In summary, Lane pointed out that, "students of Queen's University have slept long enough on this issue; let's move!"

In response to Lane's speech, Brian Copeland questioned the wisdom of holding a mass meeting. Copeland referred to the decision to "meet a Green Paper with confrontation politics" as "disgusting". He contended that if anything, "the government has extended its commitment to universities" by its recent decision to increase university operating grants by 14.4 percent.

In reply, John Wilson, AMS vice-president (University Affairs), refuted Copeland's contention by stressing that, "a Green Paper invites comment". Wilson referred to the mass meeting as "a study session." In support of Wilson, Lane claimed that the increased operating grants to universities "is not generous" and indeed is "less than last year".



HEY SHERIFF, WHAT'S IT LIKE ON THE OUTSIDE?

How's your housing

The Queen's Journal is investigating student housing conditions. We would like to hear from students living in rented accommodation which they feel is of inferior quality. Tell us about fire hazards; number of fire exits; weaknesses in the floors and stairs; dampness or flooding; insufficient washrooms; faulty plumbing; over-heating or under-heating; poor door lock; windows ineffectual in keeping out thieves and vandals; infestation by cockroaches and other creepy crawlies; noise from plumbing and neighbours; lack of cleanliness of shared property (ie apartment halls and exterior); peeling paint and wallpaper; stained ceilings; cracked and chipped linoleum; floorboards or tiles; and other poor conditions you have to endure. Our impression of student housing is one of poor conditions. However if some students are enjoying good conditions we want to hear about them as well.

Please include your name, the number of occupants including yourself who share your dwelling, the name, phone number and address of your landlord, the amount of rent you pay monthly, whether or not you have a lease, your address and your phone number. Address to Sarah Yarnell, Queen's Journal, Student's Union. We will visit several places to collect detailed information and to take photographs for the paper. We would like to have the investigation completed by mid-February, so please send in submissions right away in order to leave time for us to examine the accommodation.

Thank you very much.

Convention countdown

Tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the McLaughlin Room, Students' Union, the Queen's Progressive Conservative Association is sponsoring a policy rap session. The purpose is to formulate policy questions to be sent to all Tory Leadership Candidates, thereby making known the concerns of students at Queen's. The replies will be published in the Journal.

According to Gloria Thomson, the Association's President, the meeting is open to all interested students who wish to participate.

"Everyone should be concerned with the maintenance of a viable Opposition in Ottawa with strong leadership".

The Tories here are starting to bark Time will tell if they have any bite.

ARTS & SCIENCE UNDERGRADUATE SOCIETY AWARDS

- presented annually to 4 deserving Arts and Science students for their work in non-athletic extra-curricular activities.
- nominations complete with supporting information should be forwarded to the A.S.U.S. Office, B-105 MacKintosh-Corry Hall by January 31, 1976.
- further information is available from John Roson (Selection Committee Chairman) at 549-4291.

Nominations needed

Just seven days remain in which students, faculty or alumni may make nominations for the Alumni Award for excellence in Teaching.

Not only should a nominee have a comprehensive knowledge of their subject of instruction, they should also be habitually well-prepared for lectures, laboratories, seminars and tutorials.

Professors who generate enthusiasm for the subject in their students as well as student participation in the teaching-learning process, should be nominated for the award.

A professor's ability to motivate and communicate effectively with students are other criteria.

The award seeks as well, to recognize those members of the teaching staff who utilize methods of evaluation of student performance which stress understanding rather than memorization.

Accessibility to students after class hours and a reputation among students and faculty for excellence in teaching are further criteria

Candidates must have completed three years of full-time teaching duty as a member of the Queen's staff.

Nominations, which must be submitted to the Director of Alumni Affairs by January 19, 1976, must be signed by five students, faculty or alumni. The candidate's full name, faculty, discipline, biographical outline and reasons for nomination should be included in the nomination.

The Alumni Award, consisting of a certificate of merit and a $1000 cash award, is made after consideration by the teaching awards committee, and approval of the Executive Committee of the Board of Directors of the Alumni Association.

Jeffery dies

Dr. Ralph Lent Jeffery, former head of the Department of Mathematics for eighteen years and Professor Emeritus at Queen's died in mid-December in Nova Scotia. He was 86.

A native of Nova Scotia, Dr. Jeffery was professor of mathematics at Acadia University for nearly twenty years. In 1943 he accepted an appointment as head of the mathematics department at Queen's where he was also later Chairman of the Board of Graduate Studies before retiring from the university in 1960.

He established the Summer Research Institute at Queen's which brings together mathematicians for constructive study and research. Several countries have followed the example of the institute.

Dr. Jeffery was a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada, a membership he treasured, and for one year was president of the science section. Among his many awards were honorary degrees from six Canadian universities. The late professor's textbooks have been used throughout the world and he published many papers.

Principal Watts commented: "Jeffery Hall, which houses the Queen's mathematics department, will continue to be the active scene of a lasting memorial to his academic skills, his zest for life, his warm sense of humour and his contribution to Queen's."

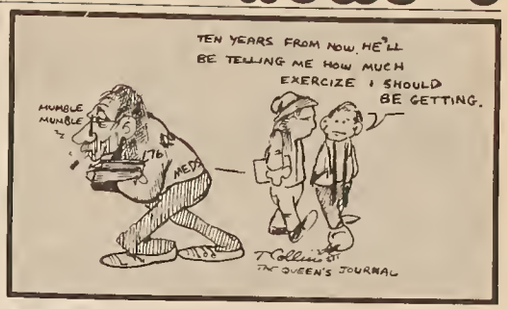
Year crests

The crests for the Arts '79 class will not be available until after reading week this year. The reason for the delay according to Rob Sylvester who took over the task of obtaining the crests in mid-December, is that en route to Toronto in October by bus, because of the mail strike, the crests were lost. Sylvester claims that nothing was done about the matter until the first week of exams. The crests will cost $7.50, an increase justified by the use of a newer, thicker type of material. The crests, being prepared by Apollo Brand Sportswears, will be available from the Campus Bookstore.

Eminent historian to speak

On Wednesday January 14, at 8pm in the Dunning Auditorium, Doctor Donald Creighton, Professor of History at the University of Toronto, will speak to Queen's students on the topic, "The Individual and the Welfare State."

Dr. Creighton, one of Canada's foremost historians, is presently Sir John A. Macdonald Professor of History at U of T. Born in Toronto in 1902, he was educated at Victoria College, U of T, and at Oxford. He holds an Honourary Doctorate of Literature from McGill and Manitoba and an Honourary Doctorate of Laws from seven Canadian Universities, including Queen's. A Companion of the Order of Canada, Creighton holds numerous medals for literary work, among them the Governor-General's Medal for Academic Non-Fiction for 1952, 1955.



His teaching career has been entirely at Toronto. Made a Lecturer in History in 1927, he became Professor in 1945 and served as Chairman of the History Department from 1955-59.

A Fellow of Massey College, Doctor Creighton has served on numerous important commissions, including on the Review of the Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1960 and the Ontario Advisory Commission on Confederation in 1965.

His publications include The Commercial Empire of the St. Lawrence, 1769-1850, Dominion of the North: a History of Canada, written in 1944, Canada's First Century, 1970, and Canada: the Heroic Beginnings in 1974.

Union coffee stays cheap

Informed sources have indicated to the Queen's Journal that they have reason to believe that coffee prices in the coffee shoppe in the basement of the Student's Union will not go to 35c (or three for a dollar) yet, according to their understanding. "We're almost sure of it" said one informed source, as he (or she) sat in his (or her) office, "but you never know". When asked, to comment on the rumour that has been kicking around ever since I can remember, two other informed sources ran away.

Seminar blues

Public speaking anxiety

M. Stoian

Seminars, seminars, seminars! This is it -- second term -- traditional time to share that special grain of knowledge with your classmates and that familiar figure of authority, the professor. You get up in front of the group; your palms start to sweat, your knees knock, your stomach knots up, your throat goes dry, you start to stutter and finally the inevitable happens - you forget everything you were going to say. After it is all over, you sit down and swear to yourself that you will never do another seminar as long as you live.

If that scene sounds familiar, albeit extreme, do not despair. Public speaking anxiety is the third most common difficulty on university campuses. Currently on campus a study is being conducted to demonstrate the effectiveness of various treatment programs. The programs are offered as part of a research project in fulfillment of degree requirements. A variety of approaches are being used, some of which have been previously shown successful in reducing or eliminating this form of anxiety.

Even if you get anxious answering a question in class, give us a call. Anxiety in these situations can be eliminated. If you are interested and would like to participate in this project, contact the Clinical Secretary, Psychology Department, Marg Innis at 547-5915 from 9 to 5 every week day.

Gord Hines, currently enrolled in the faculty of Commerce, has been involved with the Housing Committee for the past two years, and this year fills the position of Chairman. The committee itself consists of six members, each responsible for the maintenance and inspection of a certain number of units. Weekly meetings are held, during which time the lottery date, and repairs to houses and policies concerning the services operation are discussed. Committee members act as a necessary liaison between people responsible for making repairs, and those tenants who ask that they be made. A record is kept of the conditions in which the houses are found, from inspections of them conducted in both the spring and fall of each year.

The lottery date will as usual be set sometime in February, with the various reading weeks of the different faculties being taken into consideration. The houses in the lottery are those houses which are not renewed by, or to, existing tenants. With approximately fifty-two units altogether, there should be roughly 15 to 20 houses available for new occupancy this coming year. A large turnover is expected in single apartments and bed-sitting rooms. Where common areas exist within houses comprised of three to eight small apartments, student janitors are hired to look after maintenance and general upkeep.

New committee members are interviewed by existing members in the fall of the year, and are expected to complete a two-year term. The chairman is elected on a yearly basis, and to conduct operations year-round, the position of summer manager is also filled. By consisting of both old and new members, the committee is able to keep a personal record of past experiences in dealing with tenant issues, and thereby provide an ongoing source of information and understanding. In this, the housing committee exists as a service for the students by the students, in an attempt to provide relatively low-cost housing close to the university campus.

Queen's Pranks

"For it's not for knowledge that we go to college"

Terry Collins

In 1969,the Queen's Journal decided to print its own version of the McGill Daily. The issue was to be distributed throughout that campus during the Queen's-McGill Football Weekend. Sports page headlines read: All Hope Gone, and a picture appeored of a giant Golden Gael being slowed down down by a couple of small children in McGill uniforms. In a bogus interview with the McGill coach, it was reported that McGill would have a chance of beating the Gaels, "if only we had a quarterback". On the front page ran a news item indicating that the computer had fouled up and asked all students whose surnames fell within a certain range to please reregister. Some 240 students turned up at the designated time and place. The parody issue was particularly antisemetic throughout. The McGill Daily staff and McGill authorities took great offence and formulated 64 charges of copyright violation and slander against the Queen's Journal. Later these were dropped and the AMS sent a note of apology.

One of the finest pranks in the history of Canadian universities took place on February 2, 1956. Several Queen's students drove down to Watertown, Lefargeville, Clayton and Alexandria Bay, all just south of the U.S. border, on the eve of George Washington Day. There they erected Union Jacks and proclamations denouncing Washington as a subversive, scoundrel, traitor, turncoat, and rebel without cause. Therefore, the United States was being reclaimed in the name of King George III.

Most of the Americans took the incident well, however one community called in the FBI to investigate.

Reading of the incident in the London Times, ex Queen's Principal W.H. Fife wrote to say that he "would not be surprised if many in the U.S. laboured under the impression that George III was still on the throne of England."

Subsequent to the Queen's invasion, a group of Americans dubbed themselves the Thousand Islands Navy and came into Kingston to get revenge. They posted proclamations at McNeill House, City Hall and Old Fort Henry announcing that they were "Taking into possession the citadel of Upper Canada and land for miles around". The Americans were going to give it all back to the Indians and Eskimos. They left, leaving a Thousand Islands Navy flag flying over Kingston.

At an impressive ceremony in Alexandria Bay, a truce was signed over a few drinks.

In researching notable Queen's pranks, I came across a couple of amusing incidents that took place on other campuses.

Around 1960, at Antigonish Nova Scotia, a student from St. Francis Xavier University made believe that he was an Armenian priest. Priests from around the world were gathering to observe the funeral of a prominent Catholic Bishop. The student, disguised in black robes and a beard, appeared at the train station and began talking in Gaelic, hinting that he was an Armenian. A call was immediately placed to the university for an interpreter. A linguistics student, the master of ten languages, was sent only to be unfamiliar with the Gaelic dialect. The student carried the bogus priest's luggage, filled with rocks, one mile to the campus where accommodation for the visiting clergy has been promised. Upon arrival, the Armenian went from residence room to residence room in search of a suitable bed. Each time, the 'priest' would jump up and down on the beds to test the springs, and then, jabbering away in Gaelic, stalked out of the room. The escort hauled the luggage obediently until a suitable bed was found and the students therein were displaced.

When the hoax was discovered, the university officials threatened to confine all residence students to the campus unless the culprit confessed. No one did, even though the person's identity was well known.

Another incident took place near Dalhousie University when two Law students went into the local police station to lodge a complaint. They claimed that there were two Law students, dressed as workmen, tearing up a nearby street. Having said this the duo went down the road and told two youthful workmen that a couple of Law students, dressed as police officers, would be coming by to hassle them. They then stood back and watched the ensuing confrontation.

Source material for this column was taken from the files of the Alumni Association, and a Canadian Weekly. Our sincere thanks are extended to Mr. Murray Gill and Mr. Herb Hamilton for their generous assistance during production of this column.

Naturally, this is but a partial review of Queen's Pranks. The paper would be interested to receive more stories for publication in the letters section.

Proclamation

Whereas: certain sorrowful events occurred in these colonies in the year of our Lord one thousand, seven hundred and seventy-six, and

Whereas: these errors, perpetrated in a deplorable spirit of ignorance and arrogance resulted in these colonies forsaking the all-sheltering arms of his most Britannic Majesty, our Sovereign Lord George III, and

Whereas: this date, to wit, the Twenty-Second day of February has been set aside by these rebellious Colonists to mark the birthdate of a certain subversive Lieutenant Colonel in the Virginia Militia by name, George Washington, scoundrel, traitor, turncoat, rebel without cause, President.

Whereas: the hasty and ill-considered actions of this man and his hirelings are to be regretted. And since subversion is now unacceptable to any right-thinking, God-fearing American colonist, forceful steps must be taken to remove this iniquitous blot from the American escutcheon,

Therefore: We do solemnly repossess this territory and all natives inhabitant therein, together with all personal effects and do declare the same, Crown Land and Property, to the Fourth Day of July in the Year of our Lord, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-Six.

In the name of his most excellent and Britannic Majesty, George III, by the Grace of God, of England, Scotland, and the Colonies beyond the Seas, King."

In view of the recent trend to reopen investigations of assassinations, the Journal went and did some research into ex-President Lincoln. Some important questions have yet to be answered.

For instance, if John Wilkes Booth did the shooting himself, why were there so many bullets fired? How could Booth jump from the balcony, break his leg, and still elude police for 12 hours, unless they let him?

There was obviously a conspiracy. In a theatre full of people, could no one stop him if they tried? They must have let him go. They were part of a wide-ranging conspiracy whose principles still live. At the time they were Confederates. Now they're Communists. See the connection? Think about it: (Con)federates, (Com)munists, (Con)spiracy.

Booth was the agent of a powerful Southern force whose aim was the subjugation of humanity. Booth is a figurehead whose backers are also responsible for the deaths of both Kennedys and Kirg.

Just examine the famous connection between John Kennedy's death and Lincoln's. The most important is that they both died on Friday. Both got it in the head. Both were succeeded by Johnsons.

Few people would realize it, but both Johnsons are one and the same man. kept alive by primitive cryogenics: he was spizeled in bourbon for 75 years.

If that doesn't prove that everyone in the world is out to get you, nothing will. But it's all true and documented. Just don't ask where.

Why is this man wearing a hat?

At war with empty gun

So we are protesting the McKeough report! Most Queen's students don't even know what the report says let alone whether it should be protested However, "our organizations", the OFS and AMS Outer Council, have rescued us by urging us to hop on a bus bound for Toronto on January 21st and join in the rally around the "universal accessibility" maypole.

At the risk of oversimplification, I suggest that for most students, three points in chapter 7 of that report are most crucial: proposed increase of tuition fees by 65 per cent over a 3 or 4 year period, increase of OSAP loan ceiling to $1800 and reduction of maximum assistance available under OSAP to $2200 from $3200. All three proposals are attempts by the committee to decrease government committments in the field of education. So we protest - it will cost more to attend university!

Fortunately or unfortunately, that is exactly what a fair proportion of society wants, as witnessed by the last provincial election campaign - we spend too much public money on education, taxpayers said. The McKeough Report has emphasized the cross-fire that government is caught in and suggests that the government will be looking for middle-of-the-road policy in order to try to placate both groups.

What has OFS or, for that matter, the AMS Outer Council, done to help find that policy? They plan to distribute materials to gain, the Journal tells us, "support for the rally and the OFS position in general." They have missed the point. Students paid their fees to the OFS this year and Outer Council has consistently stood behind OFS demands for universal accessibility in almost every issue or discussion which has come before it. The OFS position has not changed since the last time we heard it - long range goals remain the same and short-range goals are as obscure as ever. If a campaign must be launched by the OFS to gain student support (with the students' own money), then the organization is in a sorry state indeed! Perhaps this campaign is necessary because OFS has not done what students expected of them - stop asking the rhetorical questions for a few weeks and answer some cold, hard dollars and sense questions. We have heard no suggestions - Outer Council, it seems, approved the protest on a negative basis, giving their support before they knew what OFS plans to say to its supporters at the rally or to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities in its meeting with them on this report.

A tiny comment on prejudices

Dear Editors:

Its a pity that Mr. Eastwood has to blame the unfriendly attitude of the people at Queen's on our Canadian prejudices. He should have realized that it is just Queen's nature.

Photographer, students shafted

Dear Editors:

I have not written to the Journal before, but I feel that both a very good photographer and the students at Queen's are being shafted by our supposed 'student' government. I have just been to Wallace Berry Studios to have my graduate photo taken, and am thoroughly impressed with this guy; he is a professional. He takes your picture during a conversation in which you are genuinely responding to what he says; his expressions and speech create an environment that eliminates any plastic 'cheese' response. He is not merely good with cameras, but is a professional at creating good photographs. I have also been to Cameron and Sparks, our 'official' photo studio with those 'discount student' prices one hears about. The photographer is young and does little more than say 'smile'. He appears not confident enough in his craft to create a spontaneous photograph; he instead says "I'm going to take your picture, now look like you want to" (which is as effective as the double-bind command 'Be yourself').

Ignoring my personal impressions, I have also seen several other graduating students who had a sitting at Cameron Sparks, and all were sadly disappointed. Furthermore, Wallace Berry charges $10.00 for a sitting, allows the student to keep the proofs, and charges minimal amounts for other photos. Cameron Sparks charge $15.00, retain all proofs, and charge more for enlargements than any studio I phoned. What kind of shit is this? I realize one is not required to have a sitting there, but most students trust that their best interests are being represented by our student governement, and obtain their photos at this overrated and overly expensive studio.

I am also writing because at least one very good photographer is being cheated of the clients he deserves.

Parole board playing games

Dear Editors:

We would like to introduce the students of Queen's University to the injustices and abuses suffered by one Leverne Herbert Dorsey, a black inmate at Guelph Reformatory.

Leverne is presently serving a prison term of 18 months duration for trafficking (marijuana). He has twice applied for parole to the National Parole Board and on both occasions been denied, for reasons of supposed lack of rehabilitation. We are of the opinion that he has been discriminated against since he has never been incarcerated before and has no history ofd committing acts of violence.

Leverne's major interest is in working with people and he believes that the parole board is playing games with him, and others, resulting in one becoming a broken person.

We therefore alledge that Leverne has been subjected to discrimination and cruel and unusual punishment.

The purpose of this letter is to expose the case of Leverne Dorsey and gather support to end such injustices.

The apparent negativism of both the OFS and the AMS in this issue is pointed out further by the matter of the announced 14.4 per cent increase in operating grants to colleges and universities. AMS officials tell us that, unlike the Council of Ontario Universities, they have not been "fooled" - administrative bureaucracy will "eat up" most of that 14.4 per cent and indeed, on a university basis, may result in a lower increase that we received last year.

This is very interesting, whether true or not, but if the AMS and OFS believe it to be true, why do they not go one step further and demand that the government increase the efficiency of the Ministry, enabling more funds to filter down to the university level? Furthermore, in light of their beliefs, why do they not repeat their calls to the university administration to cut corners as outlined in the AMS Financial Constraints reports? Why has the AMS not discussed Alternative student aid programs such as CORSAP (developed in 1069 by Cook and Stager of University of Toronto,) which aims at the same universal accessibility goals the OFS and AMS hold near and dear, and might be a good intermediater step. I fear that in this issue, the OFS and the AMS Outer Council will emerge looking like irritable children, whining about what they don't want done, but never saying what they do want.

Colleen Peterson earlier this term at Grant Hall

bitter grounds

Musical Artistry

Cynthia David

The hall was filled with people who knew why they'd come. Her name is Colleen Peterson. She's beautiful and talented and the girl can sing!

On stage Colleen is a vibrant performer. Her strong voice and exceptional guitar work instantly captivated the audience. She also plays the piano well but unfortunately Bitter Grounds was so hopelessly out of tune that she couldn't demonstrate her skill.

Her music follows her travels, from Kingston, her home, to Nashville, Tenn. She is as familiar with the Blues of Mississippi John Hurt as with Bill Anderson's "You've already put tears in my eyes," adding an authentic southern twang - just for fun.

Colleen is a very intense performer, pouring her soul into her music, especially her original material which displays her Joni Mitchell-style voice. In a quieter mood she sang "Music in your Eyes," a gentle Willie P. Bennett composition which she has recorded, "Sad Songs and Waltzes" and many more, to fill another evening with great music.

But apart from the recognized talent on stage, I am continually being impressed by the quality and abundance of talent on our own campus. During the first guest set Peter Stoicheff, a second-year student, appeared at Bitter Grounds. He plays sensitive creative classical guitar pieces, many of them original and arranged for several instruments. A lovely flute and guitar duet completed this artistic performance.

Next week, be prepared for a very different and entertaining evening with Michal Hasek, who is no stranger to Queen's. He will also conduct a musical workshop for those possessing a Bitter Ground's membership.

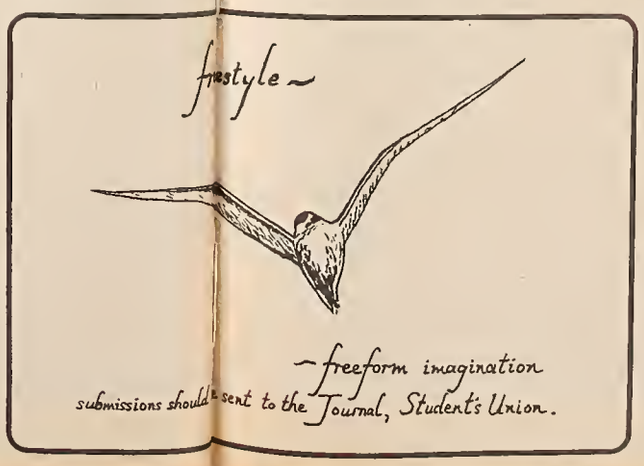
Getting to know you

your mother

If you find it difficult to stay within your food budget without eating hamburger at least four times a week, then this column is for you. It will feature low-cost, nutritious recipes which do not require a gourmet's talent. Eating well does not have to cost a lot of money but it does involve some common sense.

When faced with the prospect of living alone last year, I promised myself that I would not let my health suffer while spending only $10 - $15 per week on food and sundries for the kitchen. I managed to find many cheap, easy-to-cook nutritious recipes which gave me variety as well as a balanced diet. The majority of these recipes I also found to be time-saving during exams.

In future columns, I will be featuring one recipe, the approximate preparation time and the approximate cost of serving. Prices of meat and the main ingredients will be checked at the four major food stores in order to show you where the best buys are located in Kingston. Tips on how to save will also be included when they are appropriate to the recipe.



Here is a set of guidelines to follow before you actually start to cook. I find that these ideas saved me the most money every week. 1) One of the main rules when shopping for food is to avoid the temptation of buying unnecessaries. 2) Plan a menu for the whole week to ensure variety and proper nutrition and when you go to the store, buy only what is on your list. If you're truly concerned about saving money and eating well, you won't buy expensive desserts and snacks. Substitute those cravings with fruit and vegetables. They are just as filling but will give you something worthwhile as well. 4) Convenience foods generally cost more than they are worth. Although they can save time, the majority of meals made from these "helpers" can be made just as easily from scratch. Besides which, I found that dinners which I prepared completely by myself tasted better than those to which you "just add water and stir." Learn to judge what type of foods are necessary and what are not. Hopefully this column will also act as a guideline for you. 5) The main idea in saving money on food, however, is to set a budget and stick to it. Decide how much you can afford every week. If you have bought what you need and there is money left over, then treat yourself. You'll feel that you have earned it and the treat will be even more enjoyable.

In preparing foods, only cook as much as you think will be eaten. Recipes can be adjusted to the number of people served. But as it is not possible to always calculate the right amount, you might sometimes be stuck with a few odds and ends. Don't throw them out. There is no excuse for wasting food because I have found that almost anything can be made into a soup or some kind of casserole. Although this may sound unappetizing to some, you will be surprised what you are able to concoct with those seemingly unedible leftovers. Several future recipes will be devoted to this type of meal.

The Canada Food Guide provides a good outline when planning your menus. Although I did not strictly follow it when preparing meals, it was good to check it occasionally to ensure that I was eating properly. The daily requirements of our age group as stated in the Canada Food Guide are:

Milk:
1½ cups
Fruit:
Two servings of fruit or juice including a source of vitamin C.
Vegetables:
Two servings of vegetables, yellow or green, and preferably raw. One serving of potatoes.
Cereal or Bread:
Bread (with butter or fortified margarine). One serving of whole-grain cereal.
Meat-Protein Alternates:
One serving of meat, fish or poultry. Liver occasionally. Eggs, cheese, dry beans or peas in place of meat. Eggs and cheese at least three times a week.

By following some of these ideas, you won't have to go home all the time to eat a decent meal. Even a disaster in the kitchen will be able to create an appetising menu or at least save more money than they have been at these inflationary prices.

Swing sound spectacular

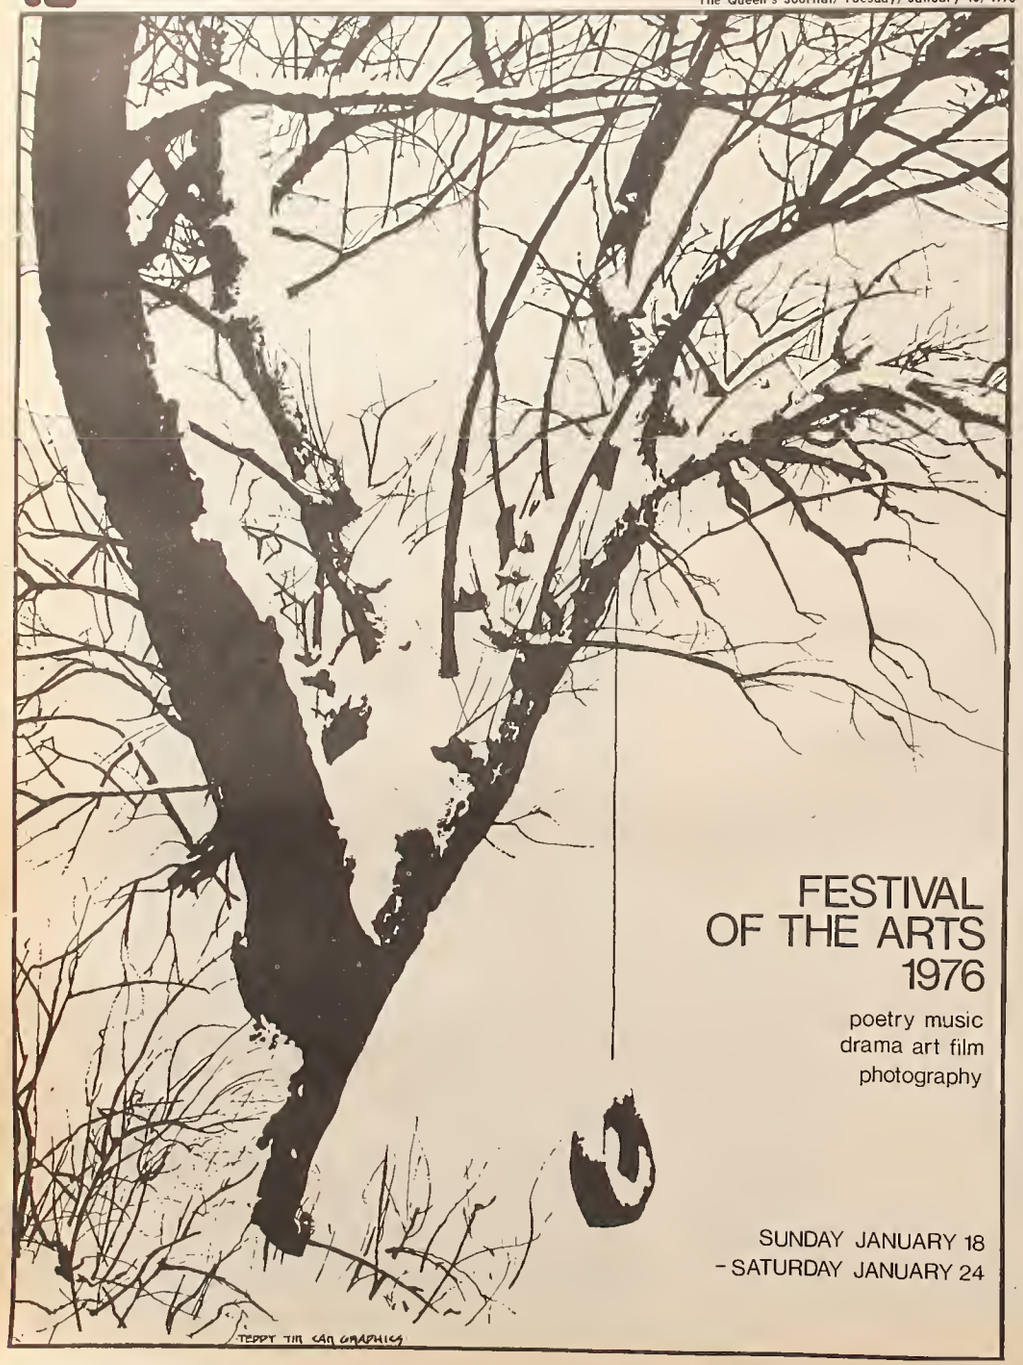
Woodrow Wilson Herman has this recurrent dream. He and his Thundering Herd have been booked for a succession of one night stands at places like the Over-40 Club in Dogpound, Alberta where he will be forced to play the syrupy dance music of the '30's for middle-aged couples wrapped up in nostalgia.

"Oy, Oy" says Woodrow Wilson Herman dressed in a grey plaid suit with red stripe, red shirt and black tie. "If I had to do what I did as a young man I would have thrown in a towel long ago.

Long ago, Woody Herman entered show business as a child prodigy clarinet player and tap dancer - derby hat and all. From that moment on, his life has been devoted to nothing but music. As a result he has been a major influence these many years on contemporary jazz music. In his music, Herman refers to yesterday, relates to today and he plays a jazz that has never gone out of style because he has adapted the music of today to the sounds of jazz.

Woody is 60 now, an incurable road rat who travels incessantly with musicians, many of whom are young enough to be his grandchildren. He does concerts, one night stands in highschools and colleges, nostalgia sessions for the over-40 group and jazz sessions in nightclubs.

Woody's current band, The Young Thundering Herd, still make the big brassy sound that all Herman bands are famous for. There are 5 trumpets, a quartet of saxaphones, 3 trombones, drums, electric bass, and piano, and of course Woody on clarinet. Sixteen talented musicians producing the total Swing sound. The precision blasts of their instruments engulf every nook and cranny of every music hall with ear-shattering sound. Still if you are a jazz buff you'll have the pleasure of live music pulsating through your body.



As Woody says, "I've always had a sound but never a style. My approach to the music I am involved in always has been let it be tasteful, let it be exciting, and always make it swing."

The Grand Theatre is getting ready for the swing sound spectacular of Woody Herman and His Young Thundering Herd. Be there on January 20 (Tuesday) at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $4 for Queen's students, $5 for the general public. Available at the John Orr Room, House of Sounds, Sam the Record Man, Tara Foods, Silver Threads and Renaissance Music.

Arts Festival/76

Alan Mann Arts Editor

If you were to walk up to the average Queen's student and ask him-her if he-she were going to go to any of the displays or concerts being sponsored and organized by the Arts Festival '76, the reply would probably be "What '76? Does that have anything to do with the bicentennial?"

The answer of course is no, it has nothing to do with the bicentennial, it's a festival of Queen's students doing their individual thing to express themselves whether it be by singing, writing, painting, or photographing.

The exact origin of the annual festival is unknown, but it has been going in its present format for about seven years now. To find out more about the Arts Festival, I spent an hour with David Eadie, this year's coordinator of the festival. A philosophy major, Eadie has been associated with the festival for the past four years in one way or another. He became coordinator because he was, as he put it, "impressed with the potential that the Festival has. Most of the areas do very well, but some of them don't, so those are the areas I've concentrated on."

Funds for the festival come from various campus organizations. "We've received less money this year than last, and our expenses have gone up. Advertising," which Eadie says is the major expenditure the Festival has, "last year was $800, but this year it's gone up to $1200, ... more than half our budget."

Some 150 people are involved in this year's Festival, the largest number to date. Included in the Festival are classical and folk music, experimental films done by Queen's film students, a photography display, also taken by students, as well as art displays, readings, and dramatic presentations.

"The primary reason for the Festival, explained Eadie "is to give people who wouldn't normally get a chance to get their work seen outside of a class, the exposure of a large group of people. Also if an engineer paints a picture, it gives him a chance to show it off in a situation he normally wouldn't be in".

This year, Arts Festival will run from January 18-24, and the different divisions of the Festival will be held in such places as Grant Hall, the Victoria Hall Common Room, Stirling "D" and the Ban Righ Common Room. "There won't be as much overlapping of events this year as last since this year it's a week long as compared to last year which was, I think, only four days."

Did this year live up to his expectations? "Yes, and more. We've had good response from all departments, except perhaps the Drama department, but that's always seemed to be a rather closed department, a bit isolated from the rest of campus. This year's festival will be the best, hopefully."

A schedule of the events will be published in the next edition of the Journal, but even then a few changes might occur. "During a folk concert for example, some one'll come up with his guitar and want to play a set, and if we have time, which we normally do, we'll let him."

Comic Masterpiece

Sandra Bernstein

Lina Wertmuller, director of Swept Away and other fine films, once laid claim to being the only Marxist in the world with a sense of humour. If one may make assumptions about the politics of Vera Chytilova, however, Lina may have to move over.

Chytilova is the Czech creator of Daisies, which was screened last Friday in the New Cinema series. It's a sumptuous film about consumption, among other things, and to tell the truth I don't feel on top of it after only one screening. I do know that I found it utterly captiviating, a series of moments so finely meshed, and realized with such jaw-dropping craftsmanship that one must recognize Chytilova as a major artist.

Daisies concerns itself with two young women who live lives of total, mindless selfishness. Caught in a state of arrested development, they are moral infants in women's clothing, inhabiting a sort of prelapsarian wonderland they witlessly create in the middle of what seems to be Prague. Because they apparently exist in isolation, not being involved in the political or productive mechanisms of society (they seem to be call girls working the convention trade), they are prey to ennui and to occasional worries as to whether they exist: workers they pass don't seem to see them. At the same time, perhaps because they live only for sensation their world takes on brilliant, often lurid colours and luxurious textures, contrasted with the grey, bleached or black-and-white tones of the outside world, which indeed we hardly see. They are as unconcerned with social action as the audience Chytilova mocks for being shocked at her characters' lack of respect for property. When the two tell us they are sincerely happy, they are wrapped and positioned as mummies - preserved corpses.

Daisies, then, is as moral and didactic a film as any socialist-realist censor could demand, but at the same time its touch is light; Chytilova never takes herself too seriously, or bores us with the simplistic.

Feminist critics seven years after its release may be troubled by the portrayal of women in Daisies; do we need to add to the thousands of empty-headed females in male-directed films? Or is this the product of a feminism secure enough to overlook the need for female heroines? Although the two here are emotionally independent of men, they seem to rely on them economically, and even their own friendship is shown to be shallow. The only role-model here is the director herself, creator of marvelous, sensual collages and Warkov-like images.

One could go on to discuss the superb photography, executed by Chytilova's husband and reminiscent of some of the Czech work shown at Expo while this work was in progress. Like the editing, it never lets us confuse image with reality, as the heroines do by eating pictures of steaks from magazines. One could also investigate the complex use of shapes and motifs, or the ways Chytilova fractures the filmic reality into a parallel of the directionless, functionless existence of her ingenuous young ladies. Suffice to say that her major achievement lies in giving us so rich an experience from these vacuous, allegorical characters.

Tiepolo Etchings

Giambattista Tiepolo was born in Venice in 1696 and in 1719 married Cecelia Guardi, sister of Francesco Guardi, Canaletto's rival in painting scenes of Venice. His son Domenico was born in 1726 and Lorenzo in 1737.

Giambattista has been described as the last of the great Italian decorative painters who provided the triumphant final chapter to the age-long history of Venetian Art. His work, particularly in fresco painting, continued in the spirit of Baroque art which first evolved in Italy in response to the needs of the Counter-Reformation and became freely adapted to both sacred and secular, to ceilings and walls alike of churches, palaces and villas. He was immensely active and appears to have been absorbed with etching for but a relatively brief time, the year 1743, when he produced the Scherzi series of twenty-two etchings and the Capricci of ten, continuing a preoccupation with magic, sorcery and occult wisdom.

Domenico Tiepolo appears to have started etching also in 1743, at the age of 16, but to have continued for thirty years. His output was largely devoted to reproductive etchings of paintings by his father, or his own, but were far more individually expressive than the normal engravings of the day

Lorenzo Tiepolo's output was more limited, nine etchings only, all after paintings, closely modelled on Domenico's style.

The Tiepolo family's work is widely scattered and comprehensive exhibitions seem unlikely. A collection such as the present one (over 200 items) can help us to experience something of the stylistic sensibilities of the period and of the real achievement of a remarkable family.

The exhibition is circulated under the National Programme of the National Gallery of Canada and is accompanied by an illustrated Journal.

George Knox, Chairman of the Department of Fine Art at the University of British Columbia, who plaanned the exhibition and wrote the text for the Journal, will discuss the Tiepolo etchings in the Art Centre at 7.30 p m. on Thursday, January 29

Exhibition continues until February 1.

From Woman's Eyes: Women Painters in Canada

International Women's Year, 1975, focused attention on the position of women in many fields in our society today. The historical presence of the woman artist in Canada, however, has not been fully investigated before. This exhibition was undertaken to present a visual survey of the contribution of women painters from the 17th century. The organizers of the exhibition, Dorothy Farr and Natalie Luckyj, selected 82 works by 45 artists who, they felt, had made or are making a positive contribution to the history of painting in Canada, irrespective of the distinction of sex.

A fully illustrated catalogue is available in which the authors provide a brief history of women painters in Canada together with a discussion of what they themselves discovered about women painters and their work during an extensive investigation. The catalogue is $5, with 10 percent discount to Gallery Association members. Exhibition continues until February 1.

Brown bag lunch at 12.30 p m on Thursday, January 8. An informal discussion with Dorothy Farr and Natalie Luckyj of the exhibition. Bring your sandwich; coffee will be provided

From Women's Eyes

Some contemporary Canadian women artists will be the subject of an illustrated lecture to be given by Mayo Graham, Assistant Curator of Contemporary Canadian Art in the National Gallery of Canada, on Thursday, January 15 at 7 30 p.m in the Art Centre. The lecture is open to all.

Mayo Graham travelled extensively across Canada in order to see the work of about 200 Canadian women artists From her experiences she selected seven artists whom she considered to be among the most original and accomplished working in Canada today and a representative selection of their work is being exhibited in the National Gallery, Ottawa, until January 13, 1976

In her lecture, Mayo Graham will discuss the contemporary women artists with specific reference to her travels and studio visits in the past two years This is a logical extension of the historically oriented exhibition From Women's Eyes.

Mayo Graham is a graduate in Fine Art of the University of Toronto and completed the Museum Training Course of the National Gallery, 1967-68. Following a year in London and Europe, she has been on the staff of the National Gallery since 1971, as Special Assistant to the Registrar.

B-ballers dump York

Lyn Atwood

In an annual University of Toronto Women's Invitational Basketball Tournament a number of University and city teams from both Quebec and Ontario were represented. Queen's was among them.

The Queen's team had been well rested for a month and the first game action they saw was against the Hamilton Mercury Bobcats. This team has a wide reputation and it is significant of the Gals great improvement that they managed to beat the Bobcats 36-33. It must be noted that Hamilton was hurting from the loss of their centre Pat Tatham who was attending another tournament with a couple of other Hamilton players. Queen's still found themselves facing a tough team and the score indicates the very defensive battle that ensued Friday afternoon.

Queen's top scorers were Penny Wedd with 10 and Laura Mattson with 7. The scoring was low and well spread out on both teams. The game was fast and the turnovers were many. Queen's offence is beginning to work smoothly and great credit must go to coaches Maureen Lisle and Stewart Beck who are continuously experimenting and working on new tactics, adjusting to each new game situation.

The Gals went on to play the York University Yeomen in their second game of the tournament. York had beaten Brock to advance to this spot.

The York game afforded few surprises. Queen's had the opportunity to show it's bench strength in this game and won the match soundly, 45-32. Top scorers were Pat Quigley with 10, Kim Headford with 9, Mary Brunton and Kathy Keely both with 8 points. Keely, the team captain again and again set up the Queen's offence which successfully penetrated the York defence. On the boards Quigley pulled down 9 rebounds Mattson and Headford 7. The shooting percentage for Queen's was 40 percent.

The top scorer for York was Marie Parissi who potted 14 points.

Queen's then advanced to the semi-finals to play Dawson college -- a CEGEP from Quebec who had previously beaten the Toronto 'B' team and McMaster. This game proved one thing -- that the Queen's Gals do not play their best at 10:00 in the morning.

The Dawson girls won 53-38 after leading by only 5 points at the half. The game did not for a minute lack excitement, however, and through a quickness in defense the Gals managed to keep Lori Sprague down to 14 points -- allowing her only 5 baskets. The second highest scorer for Dawson, Andrea Gantcher was allowed only 10 points. These two youngsters are only 17 years old and my bet is that they will be up and coming on the provincial, if not national, basketball scene. It is a credit to Queen's that, although lacking the sparkle of the day before, they stayed in the game right up until the last few minutes, when a number of turnovers and fastbreaks widened the 5 point difference to 15 points.

The Ottawa Rookies and the London Grads, who had both gotten a 'bye' in the first round of the tournament were up against each other in the semi-finals to see who would face Dawson college in the finals. The Grads lead a good deal of the game but the Rookies were stronger in the end

The finale -- Dawson College vs Ottawa Rookies -- was just phenomenal. The Rookies were thoroughly outplayed and outhustled under the boards at both ends. Many of the Dawson points came from fast breaks and Ottawa just did not seem to have it in their power to stop the girls from Quebec.

Little Lori Sprague of Dawson chalked up 37 points to lead in game scoring. The final score of this game was 82-59. This serves as a further credit to the Queen's Gals. It was no shame losing in the semi-finals to such a fine basketball team Queen's looks forward to travelling to Carleton to meet the Ravens tonight for the first league game in the 1976 schedule. ft should prove interesting as the Ottawa team is reputed to be very tough on their home courts.

Gaels bounce behind

Alps Boniwell

The Gaels Basketball team again re-emphasized in losing 75-64 to Toronto on Friday that they never seem to be content with one opponent. All season long through a succession of five different teams in the eastern division the Gaels have not only fought against the immediate opposing team but have also grappled in hand to hand combat with no great deal of success against the basketball itself. In fact rarely this year have the Gaels managed to wrestle the ball through the hoop enough times to emerge victorious and against the Blues it was no exception. So tenacious was this latter opponent in it's struggle, refusing to go down quietly that probably more than the official opposition, U. of T., it was the reason for the Gaels demise. During the course of the match only Derel Swinnard, who scored 22 points and Dave Dempster, who notched 12 in the second half alone seemed to maintain a measure of control over the ball for Queen's. For Toronto Brian Skyvington had 26.

The significance of the fact that Queen's couldn't overcome the ball often enough to win should not be lost. This was a game both teams desperately needed and each had hopes of using a victory over the other as a catalyst for vaulting them back into the playoff pictures. The loser meanwhile would submerge themselves even closer to the brink of basketball oblivion which is located at the hinquarters of the league and inhabited by such inconspicuous teams as RMC and Ryerson. Queen's having now lost to Toronto is balanced dangerously close to that edge and it will take a substantial reversal in form to stop from falling in.

This however, is not as impossible as the Gaels 1-4 record might indicate, although surely it won't be easy. There is absolutely no room for the baleful shooting efforts such as the Gaels displayed last Friday, the highlight of which was a 19 percent first half shooting percentage. Queen's has shown they can play with the teams in this league -- they've just had trouble scoring with them. Despite having more than enough opportunities they have a certain self-destructive knack of finding new ways not to put the ball in the net when it appears inevitable that - yes, this time they've got to score. Repeatedly they bounce offensive rebounds off the rim and miss open jump shots. This without a doubt is not conducive to winning. The one exception over the season to this chronic disability is Derek Swinnard who is averaging over 18 points a game and unfortunately has been Queen's only reliable source of offensive output. This is what has to change if the Gaels are to turn around. Nine games remain in league activity for Queen's and for a realistic chance at the playoffs they must win seven of those. The key to succeeding in that goal is giving Swinnard a hand with the scoring. If they do that they could give themselves a leg up in the standings. The Gaels now have to take each game one at a time and hope they hone down their sandpaper tough enough to put a few victories together. Tonight at Carleton the Gaels arrive at the last outpost. There'll be no more must games if they lose this one.

The Queen's Gaels, try as they might, could not wrench a victory out of the hands of the Toronto Blues on Friday night. The final score was a disappointing 75-64. The Basketball Gaels are at Carleton tonight.

Sports round up

Away

On Friday the women travelled to Toronto to play basketball in an Invitational Tournament. The Gals managed to defeat Hamilton 36-33 and York University 45-32. In the semi-finals the Gals lost to Dawson College 53-38. Dawson was the eventual winner.

At Toronto the Hockey Gaels defeated the Blues 3-1 as Clyde Harris stopped everything coming at him. At York on Saturday they fared worse coming out on the losing end of an 8-7 score.

Home

On Friday the basketball Gaels were defeated by U of T Blues 75-64. Wrestlers came from all over to participate in the sixth annual Queen's Open Meet. The Track team started the indoor season at the CNE on Saturday.

Coming

On Tuesday, both the men's and women's basketball teams travel to Ottawa to play Carleton University. Wednesday the hockey Gaels see action at RMC.

run Vic run

The track team started the indoor season on Saturday at the Central Region All-Comers meet held at the CNE in Toronto. The meet was viewed as a preparation for Cornell, one of the big two of the season.

A number of pleasing performances were recorded. In the women's 50 m. hurdles, both Jennifer Heathcote and Laurin MacWilliam shattered the former Queen's record of 8.4 (held by Marion Spence since 1972) with times of 8.4 and 8.6, respectively. Another Queen's record, her own this time, fell to Jan Pipe in the women's 400 metre. Jan's new time of 61.8 was a personal best performance, the long-awaited result of much hard work. Anne MacMillan ran an excellent 1500 metres to establish a new Queen's mark, 1:10 second off the old mark of 5:05.5. With a little bit more training, the 400 m. could be Kathy Cokk's race. For her first attempt, she clocked a fine 66.0. The women's sprints look forward to strong performances from Leslie Lamorre and Joanne Hiemstra.

The men also had a satisfying day. Vic Gooding recorded a 5.9 in the 50 m. and a 51.5 in the 400m. Tony Verhoeven had a busy time of it, running the 50 m. hurdles in 7.7, the 1500, in 4:10.7 and leaping to a 4th place finish in the long jump with a measure of 5 m 93. A huge contingent from Queen's (Max Barr, John Edwards, Bob McCormack, Paul Spence, Murray Hale, Adam Shoemaker, Ian Gale, and Dale Friesen, as well as Tony) ran the 1500 m. Max Barr and Adam Shoemaker recorded personal best performances and Bob McCormack scored an exciting win in his section (1:10 of a second ahead of Brian Turner of the Toronto Olympic Club).

Frieda Davy, a member of the Barbados Olympic team, is currently training with the Queen's team. She ran a 59.8 400 m.

Things are "loo-ookeeng goo-ood" for Cornell next weekend.

Hockey Gaels smash Varsity; riding 2nd after loss to York

Tom Shand

On Friday night the Gaels defeated the Blues at Varsity by a 3 to 1 score but did not have enough left to handle the Yoemen at the Ice Palace the following afternoon and consequently lost to York 8 to 7 which put them back into a tie with York for second place in the OUAA East.

The Gaels played excellent two-way hockey to defeat the Blues who were being continually stymied by Clyde Harris who stopped 39 of 40 shots directed at him. Camel shut out the Blues for 57 min. and 14 sec until ex-Marlie Graham Wise beat him on a backhand shot which Clyde never saw.

The Gaels came out of the gates fired up in the first period and it was only some tough goal-tending by Mark Logan that limited them to a single tally notched by Dale Sandler. That goal could be causally linked to the Gael's tenacious forechecking which forced Varsity to cough up the puck to Brian Harrington who fed it to Sandles in the slot. Gaels emphasized defence in the second frame and managed only two shots on Logan but they made their first one count when Willie Wing scored his first goal of the season on a classic deflection of a slow slap shot from Steve Aubrey.

Doug Grills scored the insurance marker after he picked up a loose puck as he stepped out of the sin bin. With all but one Varsity player caught up ice, Grills used Ned McIntyre as a decoy and shipped a wrist shot over the glove of Logan. Grills and the Blues' Herridge had both been issued double minors but Herridge took offence, quite literally, to the call and referee Doug Fobb, who refused to be pushed around, gave him an additional five minutes and an accompanying game misconduct for his efforts.

Unfortunately neither the fine officiating nor the Gael's tireless forechecking was evident at the York Ice Palance on Saturday afternoon. Throughout the match, obvious infractions were overlooked against both teams and consequently there were several times when the game threatened to become a free for all.

Camel Harris was victimized by some superb sharpshooting from York's top two lines. Hawkshaw and Wasson each netted a pair with singles going to Sellars, Cullen, Avery, and Titanic.

York held a 3 to 1 lead after the first period with Mike Harainis scoring the Gael's only goal. The second period was a goaltender's nightmare as the period ended 6 to 5 in favour of the Yoemen who twice were ahead by three. John Cerre, Willie Wing, and Doug Carty scored for Queen's.

York opened up a three goal lead again in a scrappy third period and with victory seemingly assured, York's Peter Ascherl, in a very barbaric display, attacked Bill White who never got a chance to throw a punch but still received a major penalty for fighting.

Gaels charged back in the final five minutes as Grills scored from Wing at 16:02. A York penalty followed and Haramis and Clarke both missed excellent opportunities to score on the power play. With just five seconds left to play Mike Haramis played the part of a pulling guard in blocking out a Yoemen defenceman at the blue line thereby allowing Steve Aubrey to move in and slap the puck past Peter Kostek for the Gael's seventh goal.

Willie Wing who had an outstanding weekend was named the third star of the game at York.

Gaels next game is against the Redmen at R.M.C. on Wednesday night.

115 attend 6th meet Queen's wrestled down

Z. Scafarelli

The sixth annual Queen's Open wrestling meet was held this past weekend. Strong teams from Guelph, Western and St. Lawrence University of Canton, New York, dominated, winning three weight classes apiece. John Park of University of Guelph was named outstanding wrestler of the meet as he finished on top of seventeen other competitors in the 142 lb. class. Overall, the tournament attracted 115 competitors and produced many close and exciting bouts.

Top performer for Queen's was Mike Druhytie who placed second at 167 lbs. Alex Fasenuk and Al Stewart failed to place in the top three at their respective weights, but did manage to win a couple of bouts before being eliminated.

The team will travel to Western next week for another tournament. On Tuesday Jan. 13, a special hockey challenge match will be held in the Jock Hardy Arena at 7:00 p.m. The wrestlers will be playing the Golden Gals hockey team for the second year in a row. The Gals will be out to avenge last year's crushing defeat.

Editors Note: See the wrestling Gaels in action against the Hockey Gals at 7:00 tonight in Jock Harty. This is the second annual rock'em sock'em hockey game.

Toronto rally

Placard-waving only hurts us

The OFS mass rally to be held in Toronto on Jan. 21 is the wrong way to protest the recommendations embodied in the McKeough report. We are at University to learn how to think and therefore we should be proposing better solutions to the provincial government than those found in the McKeough report. The purpose of a mass rally is to make news and to sway public opinion over to the side of the protest.

However, this method has backfired. For instance, the placard-waving and mass rally technique used by the Toronto high school teachers in the present strike have served to lower the esteem of the teachers in the public eye, if you use the Letters to the Editor columns of the major Toronto newspapers as an indicator. The student protests in the late 1960's are another example of how the mass rally technique caused more harm than good. Some historians have said that those protests are a main cause of the drop in government funding of Universities.

Pete Lane, who proposed that Queen's send a delegation to the mass rally, has said that the Ontario Federation of Students will give a report to the government based on past OFS resolutions. The only thing to expect from that report are requests for free tuition and a living stipend. These requests are based on the assumption that post-secondary education is a right and not a privilege. In many countries a post-secondary education is reserved only for the very bright. The applicants are judged through a series of exams and interviews and, when accepted, are given a free ticket all the way through university. This proposal deserves more study than either Peter Lane or the OFS has given it.

Another way of opposing the McKeough report is to submit a counter report from the University community which deals with all the sections of the government report. This report would have the same cost-cutting goals but different priorities, and it may reach the same financial figures that the McKeough report reached.

Our political system is based on confrontation. Viable counter proposals would be a welcome change and they would almost certainly be more effective.

What with three days to go before the deadline for AMS Executive nominations, it appears that not much interest is being generated for candidates. No one who has been rumored to be running is admitting that they intend to contest the spots, the most powerful in the Alma Mater Society.

Perhaps none is convinced that he would win. Perhaps each is sizing up the competition.

In any event we'll have to wait until Friday to find out, for sure, who will run.

If you are interested, get a couple of friends and round up 250 signatures down in Leonard Hall during the supper hour. You will have to put up twenty bucks which will be returned to you after the election if you don't break any rules. The AMS will pay expenses incurred during the campaign up to the limit of $75 if you win a mere twenty percent of the vote.

To ensure a better press

Two fundamental aspects of a democracy might finally be introduced into the process of choosing the editor-in-chief of the Queen's Journal. We're speaking of the election process and freedom of the press. Until now, a nine member selection committee has chosen the editor, and four of these individuals have been top politicians in the student government. Now there is a chance that the Journal staff may elect their editor, thus freeing the newspaper from undue government influence. (See story page

With a staff election, student votes in the choosing of the newspaper editor would increase from nine to over forty or fifty. Thus more students would be granted a say in who would edit their paper. The many students who work on the paper from year to year are the best judges of candidates for the editorship. They have the experience and technical expertise necessary to assess a candidate's abilities and ideas. Very important too, staff support is needed by any editor and is guaranteed for the candidate who wins the most votes in the election. Without support, an editor is incapable of putting out a paper. Without staff support, there would be an unsuccessful Journal.

Freedom from influence of the student government is essential for both a healthy paper and government. These two must be separate, allowing the paper to criticize and objectively report on the government. (Can you imagine the editor of the Globe and Mail being selected by the Prime Minister and his Cabinet?) The student government has said that because $4.50 of each student's money helps to finance the paper, Outer Council deserves a large say in choosing the editor. We disagree. A publisher - as the student society (AMS) is in this case - should be concerned not with choosing the editor and exerting other types of editorial control, but the paper's financial situation. The forty or fifty staff members who would be voting for the editor are effective representatives of student interests; as students, they are qualified to determine how to wisely spend the $4.50. Any student who wants a say in the paper's editorial policy is encouraged to contribute four times and vote in the election of the editor.

We're glad that the old system had to go. Traditionally, the politicians on the selection committee voted for one candidate and the Journal representatives another. Besides being characterized by this senseless block voting, this system was rife with political favouritism and other types of dirty politics. We know that some politicking will continue under the proposed system, but feel that more checks on this are inherent in having forty or fifty students vote, than there were in the selection system. And whereas incompetent editors were often chosen by the old process, it is unlikely that an incompetent will be elected by the individuals who have to work with him. Without adequate abilities, a candidate will not earn the support necessary to be elected.

Some individuals have expressed concern that an outsider - someone who has never worked on the paper - would not have a chance of being elected. This is not so. All students are given several chances to make the staff aware of their abilities - at the all-candidates meeting, in the paper and in the office. If someone showed that he had the experience and possessed sufficient expertise as well as solid ideas, he would gain the staff's support. A person with lofty ideas and inadequate newspaper experience would not get the necessary support, and this is one of the safeguards of the system.

Another point in favour of the proposed system: the Canadian University Press CUP, an association to which most student papers of this nation belong - endorses the proposed policy. In fact, the CUP constitution states that the editor of a CUP paper must be chosen by staff election.

With so many points in its favour, it might seem surprising that Outer Council may not approve the proposed system. Traditionally, Outer Council and the Executive have loved their say in the choice of Journal editor. To let go of this power will be hard for this year's government who has not yet had their chance to play the game.

We were impressed by the attitude of the student government representatives on the committee responsible for the proposal. Ian Nordheimer and Paul Steep, both members of the AMS executive, showed open minds and wise judgements. We hope that Outer Council does the same.

Three teams had declared themselves as candidates for the AMS Executive, when this paper went to press at 3:30am Thursday. Nominations close today at 5pm, and the election will be held February 4-5, 1976.

The race is on...

Jamie Avis. President
"I want to do the job. I think I would be good at it."
Jamie Avis is 26, from Kingston, and is in 2nd year law. He is also working on his Masters thesis in Computer science, and has an Honours B.A. in philosophy. Right now he is the AMS Education Commissioner, Junior Law rep on Outer Council and member of the Law Faculty Board. Before becoming Education commissioner this year, he was Assistant External Affairs Commissioner. Avis is a member of the AMS committee to study policy of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) and Queen's input into the OFS. This fall he represented Outer Council in the Aesculapian Society vs. Outer Council case which came before the AMS Court and was part of what has become known of as the John Gray Affair.

Paul Steep Vice-President (Operations)
"I want to have my own chance at a whole year to develop my own program rather than fulfill someone else's. I really believe that the AMS is a viable organization for student input in the university and community."
Paul Steep, 21 comes from Guelph and is a 3rd year English student. Since mid-November, he has been Vice-President (Operations), promoted from Internal Affairs Commissioner when the office of AMS President became vacant. He was on the Senate Teaching awards committee last year, and as a reporter for the Queen's Journal, did several articles on the AMS and financial constraint.

Kathy Wood Vice-President (University Affairs)
"I like working with people and the AMS gives me the opportunity to do that. I hope to provide some new ideas."
Kathy Wood is 21, comes from Newburgh, Ontario, and is in 3rd year economics. This year she has been an Arts rep on Outer Council, the AMS Housing Liaison, member of both the AMS day care committee and AMS committee to assess what type of student government Queen's students would like, and team member of the Hockey Gals. In 1974-5 she was Co-director of Info-bank and was an AMS constable. She was Vice-Block Chairperson of Adelaide-Ban Righ in 1973-4.

Bob Butterill, Vice-President (Operations); Cindi Hall, President and Ross Brown, Vice-President (University Affairs)

Ross Sutherland President
"There is a real need for a socialist perspective concerning what students ought to be doing on this campus."
Ross Sutherland is 23, calls Kingston his home, and is in his 3rd year of political studies but says he is not working towards a degree. He is currently secretary of the Kingston Socialists. In 1974, he was project co-ordinator of Course Guide, a publication of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society.

Brian Lawson Vice-President (Operations)
"There are lots of problems in our present society that stem from the system we live under. We've got to change all that. Students are an important component in our society and should begin to deal with serious issues, not so much with pubs, etc."
Brian Lawson is 21, comes from Don Mills, and is in 3rd year politics. This is his first year at Queen's; he has studied at the University of Toronto for two years. He is a member of both the Kingston Socialists and the Revolutionary Marxist Group.

Gale Blank Vice-President (University Affairs)
"I saw a need for a change, and decided to use a socialist platform as a vehicle."
Gale Blank is 20, comes from Montreal, and is in 3rd year Chemistry. She is co-director of the AMS Women's Affairs office, and is a member of the AMS committee to investigate day care facilities. She has worked for the Birth Control and Abortion Information and Referral Service. In 1974-5, she was on the sub-committee concerning Dunning Trust lectures.

Case

Paul Steep, Vice-President (Operations); Jamie Avis, President and Kathy Wood, Vice-President (University Affairs)

Cindi Hall President
"I really believe that I'm the best person around here for the job."
Cindi Hall is 21, grew up in Toronto and East Aurora N.Y., and is in 3rd year biology She is this year's Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Vice-President; has been a student rep to the Arts and Science Faculty Board 1974-6; was a Senate rep on the University Council on Athletics 1973-4; was a member of the advisory committee to select a Dean of Women 1975; and was the DSC chairperson for microbiology and immunology 1974-5.

Bob Butterill Vice-President (Operations)
"My background in business brings me to do the job. My experience at the year level, at the faculty level and as a commerce rep on Outer Council gives me the experience to do the job. I think I can do the job and am as qualified as anyone here to do it."
Bob Butterill is 21, has grown up in Kingston, and is in 3rd year commerce. His extra-curricular activities include being the President of the Commerce Society 1975-6; President of Commerce 77 in 1974-5; a boss in orientation 1974; a student rep on the Commerce Faculty Board 1975-6; and a member of the AMS re-evaluation committee.

Ross Brown Vice-President (University Affairs)
"I think I could do the job. I'm interested in working on the university level rather than on the society level (of university government)."
Ross Brown is 21, his home is now in Ottawa, and he is in 3rd year commerce. He is currently the business manager for Golden Words; is on the AMS Curriculum committee; was on the commerce student-faculty committee 1974-5; was a boss in orientation 1974; and was on the Inter-Residence discipline committee 1974-5.

NDP critic attacks Henderson reports

Ross Bartlett

On Monday night, David Warner, New Democratic Party critic for Colleges and Universities in the Provincial Legislature, addressed a meeting sponsored by the Campus NDP on the subject of the Henderson Report.

Warner is an old party member but this is his first term at Queen's Park. Formerly, he was an elementary school teacher. He has been a student at Carleton, York and U of T, and he is travelling the province visiting "administrative staff, sports staff, faculty and students" at various colleges and universities.

In an informal discussion of the Henderson Report, Warner spoke more of philosophies than of specifics. Referring to the Report as somewhere between "Through the Looking Glass and 1984" and to Maxwell Henderson as "akin to the Mad Hatter", Warner claimed that what bothers him is not the facts of the Report. These, he said can be debated. What troubles him is "the general philosophy." Contrary to statements by various members of the AMS executive in recent days, Warner contends that "this report can very easily provide the philosophy for the policy of the next budget."

He stated that "we are looking at an increase in tuition to almost double" that will have "disasterous effects on those who have not yet entered" university. This change will "see parents having their children go into substantial debt." As he said, "in all fairness, the government has neither accepted nor have they rejected the philosophy" of the Report, "yet the Treasurer has said it is good medicine." This, Warner claimed, is "sheer, utter nonsense."

He pointed to the fact that anyone choosing to go to Queen's from another locale will have to "pay a stiff penalty for the choice to go here." With rising tuition costs and increased rents, costs could soon go beyond a student's reach. He pointed out that the Report will have "several effects." As "the largest employer in Kingston" any effects on Queen's will be felt "not just by faculty, but it could affect the 1600 support staff" and you could have a "pretty serious economic problem...and a potential welfare cost." The "effects on the immediate city could be disastrous."

The cost to the student could be just as "horrendous." He may "be forced, by economic need alone to attend a university not of his choice." You are "cutting costs, but at what price? If we wish to save money, we must plan for more than one year at a time. But this government has never done this." Warner stressed that an NDP government would give the universities "the kind of long range planning they want."

Warner stated that there must be a "different way to pay for all education" because we are "now on a collision course with the tax payers." You could, he claimed, eliminate the education part of the property tax and replace it with a "one percent surcharge on industrial profits plus a portion of the income tax." Although the NDP has "no precise figures," the industrial tax should come to half the education costs."

The evening concluded with a discussion of various educational and governmental issues. Warner sought opinions on such matters as structured courses and compulsory subjects at the high school level, the need for Grade 13, the raising of the drinking age and seatbelts.

David Warner discusses the Henderson Report on Monday night. Warner is the NDP critic for Colleges and Universities in the Provincial Legislature.

Study started from "buckle up" law

Barb Nyland

It is now mandatory to buckle your seatbelts while travelling by car in Ontario and reduced speed limits will take effect on our highways as of February 1. This legislation has provided psychology professor Dr. G. Wilde with a unique research opportunity.

Dr. Wilde is studying the human aspects of traffic safety as part of QUESST, the Queen's University Establishment for the Study of Safety in Transport. This is a three year project which was started by Queen's in 1974.

Dr. Wilde has set up various observation posts in the Kingston area to observe the reactions of drivers to the new seatbelt and speed legislation. Using the license numbers of the cars which are observed, information about the driver's age, driving record and sex are obtained. Wilde is attempting to see whether there is any correlation between these characteristics and the length of time it takes the driver to co-operate with the new laws.

Although he admits that many seatbelts are badly designed, Dr. Wilde supports the compulsory seatbelt legislation. This is not an invasion of the individual's privacy, he feels, because traffic accidents are a danger to the community as a whole. Expenses carried by the community because of traffic accidents are over one billion dollars per year in Canada, states Dr. Wilde. A driver remaining in his seat during an accident has more of chance of controlling his car and avoiding other cars.

Dr. Wilde says he feels that it is not always useful for merely the driver and front seat passenger to wear safety belts. A recent study in France indicates that a significant number of front seat passengers have been killed by back seat passengers who have been thrown to the front of the car on impact.

Dr. Wilde strongly disagrees with the exemption of policemen from the compulsory use of seatbelts. Drivers have a strong influence over each other and the police could be a major source of example for other drivers. The importance of imitation among drivers has been pointed out in studies which indicate that drivers are more likely to signal a turn if they see the person in front of them signalling the same turn.

Dr. Wilde feels that few people are aware of the magnitude of the traffic accident problem. Approximately 6,000 people die on the road in Canada per year. Road accidents are the leading cause of death when the total number of years of potential life lost as a result of them are considered. This is because the greatest number of people who die in traffic accidents are under the age of 40 whereas other major causes of death such as heart disease affect people over this age, states Dr. Wilde.

"The development of safer cars and safer roads will not solve our accident problems" says Dr. Wilde. He feels that the solution of the problem lies in reducing the amount of risk drivers are willing to take. Experiments indicate that tolerated risk is a characteristic which drivers attempt to keep at a constant level while they are driving. On a straight stretch of well-designed road, drivers will tend to speed up to increase the level of risk they are taking. If there are environmental hazards on the road the driver will slow down or take other measures to reduce risk. The level of tolerated risk remains constant and statistics show that the number of accidents remain the same despite the degree of safety of the road.

A number of studies appear to back up Wilde's views. In 1967 Sweden changed from left hand to right hand traffic and there was approximately a 20 percent drop in road fatalities. When drivers regained their confidence the fatality rate rose to the same level as before the changeover states Dr. Wilde.

Outside of his work with QUESST Dr. Wilde is working with the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport at Queen's. He is studying the human aspect of locomotive design such as the ease with which drivers can perceive instrument panels. He is also involved with a study of road user behaviour at railway crossings.

Go to...Europe

Interchange, a non-profit foundation based in Amsterdam, has opportunities for students and teachers from North America who wish to see Europe. You can do anything from Olympic skiing to working and earning your way around during the summer and fall. Hitchhikers are given special help to facilitate travelling.

For people interested in language credits, there are language camps. As one alternative to that you can bicycle through countries such as Holland and France. There are other benifits from the $2 monthly subscription fee. These include greatly reduced air fares, and 50 percent off on train fares in Europe.

Interested students and teachers can obtain information and application forms by sending their name, address, school name and one dollar or the equivalent in stamps to Interchange, Box 5579, Amsterdam, Holland.

Opinion: Orientation

Submitted by the Orientation Committee

Orientation Week is one of the traditions on which Queen's prides itself. There is little consensus however on what constitutes the ideological basis of the week. The organizing committees of past years have all grappled with this problem, and it is a reflection on their efforts that the week is generally so highly regarded.

Recently, however, the whole concept of orientation has been subjected to growing criticism. Increasingly, it is the non-essential elements of the week which receive the greatest amplification in the public post mortem. From the point of view of the frosh (if such a sweeping generalization may be permitted) the concern is rather academic. Orientation Week was a one-shot affair, and in spite of any shortcomings in the programme, each frosh found a more or less effective way to orient himself.

The point is that the week has no all-encompassing goals. It is the individual that is important. It is not, or should not, be concerned with reproducing university life (whatever that catch-all means). If it were, fully half the week would be devoted to work. But it cannot be: university is what the individual makes of it, not something in which he is involved peripherally.

It has very little to do with helping the frosh adjust to his new life away from home. If he did not attend university he would receive no help of the magnitude envisaged in Orientation Week. Students at other universities show few signs of a failure to integrate socially as a result of a lack of orientation. If the frosh is extroverted he will, in the vast majority of cases, continue to be extroverted. If he is introverted, why and by what right is he pulled unwillingly from himself?

This is not to say that the frosh should be abandoned. Insofar as an attempt to smooth the transition to university life does not restrict the ability of the frosh to help himself, it is to be approved. Within the gael-frosh system as presently defined, a totally passive gael is of little use. What is needed is support and encouragement when it is sought; restraint when it is not.

Orientation Week begins with exposure to all the varied facets of the university. But that is only the beginning, for the individual must be free to choose the facets which he wishes to encounter, and the gael group imposes severe limitations on such an ability in any but an academic sense. Too often the gael perceives attrition of the group (HIS group) as a reflection on himself. This is not the case--if a normative significance is to be attached at all, an independence on the part of the frosh is to be viewed positively.

More importantly, the choices which the frosh makes must be real choices--choices which involve some self-examination. Given the initial alienation of the frosh and the dominance of the gael group, it seems hardly surprising that social pressure dictates a mass exodus to the pub as opposed to some more esoteric activity.

Finally, orientation week must stimulate a questioning of the university itself. Without wishing to add to the present controversy regarding the financial foundations of the university, it must be said that, regardless of the terms of reference, university is not for everyone. Blind acceptance of one's attendance is a failure to consider a very real alternative. Clearly, there is no specific set of realizations to be made regarding the week. But neither is it a mere showcase for all the activities which the university includes. The individual is the essential part of those activities--without him there is nothing. Think about it. Applications for gaels are available in B-105 MacKintosh-Corry until Friday January 23, 1976.

Ed. conference

Submitted by McArthur Students' Society

The Students' Society of the Faculty of Education at Queen's University is planning a large scale conference on the subject of educational alternatives for Friday, January 30 and Saturday, January 31, 1976.

A multi-media session will be presented on Friday monring to provide information about the theory and implications of deschooling, and also about the ideas of Edgar Z. Friedenberd and Antony Burton who will be our key note speakers on Friday afternoon.

Following their presentations, seminars will begin on questions brought out in their discussions. A wine and cheese party will conclude the afternoon.

Saturday's agenda will begin with a presentation by the Twin Valleys alternative community. Participation is very important to this conference and, therefore, after the presentation, everyone at the conference will have the opportunity to attend different workshops dealing with such areas of activity as music, drama, dance, art, life skills, outdoor education, special education and media. These workshops will stress the importance of alternative methods of education outside the system.

Saturday evening, Stringband from Toronto will be performing. Many people have shown a great deal of interest in the conference, and we are sure that it will be a very exciting event.

Registration materials will be available to anyone who would like to phone or write to:

Campus Comment

Fredericka Birke

"If I only knew more about this topic I would comment, but I'm only a student here," was the general attitude of those questioned by the JOURNAL'S CAMPUS COMMENT reporter this week. With AMS executive elections just around the corner, the Journal asked Queen's students which issues they felt should be stressed.

When confronted with this question, Paul Muir (Commerce '77) was at loss for words. "I see that I should really get more involved in University affairs," for I'm rather unsure of the real function of the AMS." Paul honestly replied, "I tend, like most, to sit back until something happens, and then I criticize." After reflecting for a moment, Paul stated, "tuition fees should play an important role in the upcoming election." He felt that we should realize, however, that a university of this caliber requires more money to keep it going and to maintain its standards. Another point Paul mentioned was the qualifications of those seeking the position of president of the AMS. "Whether the president is a student or not should not be the question. Interest in his job and in what he can do for the university should be of utmost importance." Paul added, "I feel totally indifferent to martyrs; those attempting to combine academics with student affairs. One shouldn't worry, though; there will always be a 'select few' around to play the role of the martyr and carry all the work on their shoulders."

Paul Muir

"It's hard to answer such a question on campaign issues," admitted John Leavitt (Mechanical Engineering '78). "I suppose I haven't really given it much thought." In the course of the interview, campus housing was concluded to be the most important issue John felt that the AMS should definitely focus in on "the landlords and their dealings;" a problem he believes affects all of us. "Since there is no longer as much money now as there used to be, grants will be harder to come by," John felt this was reason enough for more AMS control over 'unnecessary' university expenditures. "To tell you the truth, I wouldn't mind paying a higher tuition fee if it meant I would be working in a decently equipped laboratory for a change." With respect to the issue of universal accessibility, John added, "There are far too many 'imports' in this university. I wouldn't mind if these foreign students would become more involved, but they usually keep to themselves. As a matter of fact, I wouldn't mind if they took their education and ran, instead of sticking around and getting all the marks, and all the jobs too for that matter." John, however, gave no suggestion as to how the AMS could play a role in this issue.

John Leavitt

Lori Houser and David Porter (both in History '76) strongly felt that any issue other than the smoking issue should be stressed during these elections. "It's rather sad how some issues can be so drawn out, whereas others which are often more important are skimmed over." Lori excused herself for not having enough contact with university affairs to give what she felt would be a decent answer. "If anything, I suppose Student Services should be a major concern of the AMS," was her final reply. "Student Services such as the Abortion and Birth Control Centre, however, should not be the only focus of student government." At this point, David interjected, "in the past, there has been a tendency in universities of running solely student affairs, rather than looking beyond their own noses and considering such issues as the university and society." David suggested that it is important for the AMS to begin developing a more 'outward' approach to issues in question. "Even the Journal is guilty of harping on such issues as the painting of crests, the profits of the pub, and the antics of the engineers."

Lori Houzer & David Portar

Dava Brining

Dave Brining (Commerce '79) believed stress would once again fall on the typical issues such as the rise of tuition fees, government support of universities, and the question of the 'liquor license' at Queen's events. "The McKeough Report, I feel, was just perfect timing, and will probably be a highly considered issue." Dave personally felt that the OFS and the AMS should increase their participation with respect to the issue of a tuition hike. As a member of the Commerce Faculty Board, Dave feels that his influence makes little if any progress at times. "There should be more AMS support for such faculty boards, and more backing for the DSC as well. It seems that student-represented organizations are still unable to do much of anything on their own."

Rena Bedard (English '76) admitted, "I honestly can't give you an answer. I've been so disillusioned with the way this university is run, that I really don't care any longer." Rena generally expressed the opinion that all candidates are usually in the race for causes other than those expressed in their platforms, therefore, "suggesting issues to be stressed in the upcoming elections is futile." Rena added, "the faces change but the game goes on." As far as Rena was concerned, there has not been enough coverage on this election from the JOURNAL. "What is needed is in-depth coverage comparing the individual platforms, and making the students more aware of who the candidates really are." According to Rena, the Journal plays a vital role in this much needed coverage of the AMS elections. "Everyone picks up the JOURNAL, whereas not everyone is always willing to go out and attend meetings at which the candidates express their views." Rena ended with the comment, "I'm so apathetic now that I don't know if greater awareness of the election situation would make any difference."

Rana Bedard

John Robertson (Politics '77) replied with a three-fold answer. "First, the revamping of the position of AMS president should be considered, and should deal with whether or not this position is to be held by a full or part-time student." Another issue John suggested dealt with the financing of student activities, especially in the areas of financial constraint. "Shall athletic fees, for example, be paid by all, or just by those using the facilities?" With regards to student involvement, AMS should concern itself with future government planning dealing with academic standards and the issue of universal accessibility. John concluded by touching upon the idea of student financing. "The acquisition of library books, as well as the conditions of science labs should be given a closer look."

Nutrition fakery in food industry biochemist claims

(CUP)-- "What we don't know about food...can hurt you, and hurt you very seriously," said Ross Hall, Biochemistry professor at McMaster University.

Hall was speaking on "Nutrition Fakery in the Food Industry - Food Processors' Contribution to Heart Disease and Cancer" as part of a nutrition lecture series at the University of Waterloo.

Hall termed nutrition labelling, required in the States and expected to come to Canada, "very misleading."

Using a list of five vitamins and minerals with the recommended daily allowances of each for the majority of adults, Hall showed that only 33 out of 1,000 people would fall into every category.

"You have very individual requirements for vitamins and minerals," he explained. "The recommended daily allowances are absolutely useless when it comes to predicting your personal requirements."

Hall produced an advertisement which claimed that a 1¼ ounce bag of potato chips reinforced with Vitamin C is more nourishing than an apple.

"Vitamins are no good if the basic nourishment is lousy," declared Hall.

The U.S. government has decreed that two "super" donuts (vitamins and minerals added) plus one glass of milk consitiues an "official meal" providing one third of the daily nutritional needs, Hall said. It is being sold in five states as part of the school lunch program.

When nutritional labelling comes to Canada, the Canadian consumer is going to be completely bamboozled with the connivance of our federal government, he warned.

Eighty percent of food sold in Canada is factory processed or "fabricated", Hall reported. The effect of fabrication on nutritional quality is the loss of nutrients - known and unknown - and the destruction of molecular relationships within any natural food substance, Hall explained.

These relationships are critical to the way in which food is digested, and yet their importance has not been stressed as much as that of nutrients, he added.

Most chocolate products such as chocolate chip cookies and eclairs are synthetic, as well as the cheese in any prepared food, such as macaroni and cheese or pizza, said Hall.

He wondered what the long-term effect might be of eating milk puddings which are treated chemically to keep the starch from breaking down. In every natural substance there is a mechanism for self-destruction - milk should go sour, bread should go stale, and meat should go rotten.

"It has to be changed greatly if it does not," Hall explained. Although the protein in soybeans is very good, processing can result in a loss of two essential amino acids and several minerals, said Hall. As artificial hamburger, it doesn't compare to meat for nourishment. He added that there are no requirements for the synthetic product to be labelled if it appears in a prepared food.

Hall condemned the practice of striking eggs from the diet because of cholesterol content as "ridiculous." "Whole eggs are probably the most nourishing food possible."

Referring to a chart from a poultry journal, Hall pointed out that over the last 15 years the consumption of eggs has gone down, while the incidence of coronary heart disease has gone up.

Hall explained that every cell in the body contains cholesterol, and dismissed the notion of an increase risk of heart attack due to eating cholesterol as "purely conjecture."

People who eat a natural diet, Hall concluded, do not get ulcers or cancer of the colon which is on the rise as a major killer in Canada

Chinese newspaper widely read; discussed

(CUP)—Chinese people have a greater knowledge of current world events and are "well read" when compared to Canadians, student journalists were informed at the Canadian University Press conference at the end of December in Montreal.

Steve Griffiths, a Canadian freelance radio journalist who spent two years at Peking University as an exchange student, said the Chinese tend to "read more seriously and thoroughly than Canadians and are exposed to a wider selection of world news".

Chinese people read their papers during lunch breaks which last two hours, and in "intense" political study sessions, Griffiths said. "A certain time of the day is devoted to reading papers and the articles are then discussed heatedly".

He said the largest circulation Chinese paper is Reference News, a daily which is a digest of world news and culls news reports from UPI, AP, AFP, and Reuter News Agencies. Reference News attempts to report "issues which significantly affect the development of the world."

Griffiths said the selecton of articles from foreign news agencies is done carefully so as to avoid including "trivia such as kidnappings, plane crashes, and bank robberies, and to give an all-round perspective of the major events happening in the world".

Reference News and other papers concentrate on recent developments in the European Common Market, detente, and the Angola situation. They include foreign reports on China, both progressive and reactionary, so the Chinese will know what world opinion is about their country, Griffiths said

He disputed the claim made by some western observers that Reference News is read only by Chinese Government officials. "Our work team at university had a subscription to it and everyone read and discussed it during the day", he said.

"I was amazed at their knowledge of world affairs. For example, they knew about Trudeau's wage and price controls before I did, and came and asked my opinion on them."

Chinese people ask a lot of questions about labor strikes, Watergate and Wounded Knee which counters the Western prejudice that Chinese papers carry only a limited number of international newstories, Griffiths added.

He said all Chinese papers display the same interest in events of national and international importance as opposed to more sensational news such as fires, rapes and murders.

"I'm not saying things like rapes and murders don't happen in China. But newspapers don't consider them newsworthy." The "morbid satisfaction" of what goes wrong in other peoples lives doesn't interest Chinese journalists Griffiths said.

Chinese papers also cover political, cultural, educational and sports events in a different manner than in the West. They tend to be more political and analytical in their articles, he said.

Griffiths said all papers in China are under the control of the Communist Party. The People's Daily, which has the second largest circulation in China, is controlled by the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party.

Asked about possible censorship by the party, "the Chinese People would agree this could lead to press dictatorship and use of the paper for propaganda purposes, but they would qualify this by saying there are two kinds of dictatorship in the world," Griffiths said. One kind is the "bourgeois dictatorship in the west which determines who controls the papers, who write them, and whose interest they serve," he said. The other is the "Proletarian Dictatorship which is biased in favour of the working class."

Student groups may unite across the country

(CUP)-Canada's national and provincial student organizations are one step closer to possible amalgamation and will draw up a common program as a result of a two-day meeting in Ottawa January 3 and 4.

The target set for the creation of "one student organization" is May 1977.

Delegates from five student organizations resolved to work on a "restructuring plan" which will be presented at the organizations' respective spring conferences. Also to be presented is a "common program" of action which will be drafted when the organizations next meet in February.

The participating organizations are the Nation Union of Students (NUS-UNE), the British Columbia Student Federation (BCSF), the Federation of Alberta Students (FAS), the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), L'Asssociation Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec (ANEQ), and the Atlantic Federation of Students (AFS).

The delegates agreed that the common program should centre around the issue of universal accessibility, as it applies to such question as student aid, unemployment, tuition, spending cutbacks and student housing.

Each organization will outline its own strategy, but a "commitment to intensify" the work on the program must be taken, the delegates agreed.

The meeting was the second in a series to discuss improved co-operation among Canada's provincial, regional and national student organizations.

Ian Nordheimer, AMS President, approves of the idea of one national student organization, if it can be accomplished by consolidating the various regional and provincial associations.

While such a move would give all of the universities in Ontario the same representation as all of the universities in Alberta, Nordheimer felt that the proposed amalgamation would be more manageable.

New awards

Ross Bartlett

The Arts and Science Undergraduate Society is instituting a new series of awards for non-athletic extra-curricular activity.

The awards are being used to replace awards that were being given prior to 1967-68, the year ASUS came into being. At that time the Arts and Science Society for Men gave four awards yearly. These awards haven't been given since then and Bob Atkinson, ASUS President, "Would like to see the system up-dated a bit."

The Society plans to retian the same number of awards, which "shall be presented to four members of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society who through example of action in non-athletic activities have made an outstanding contribution," as the ASUS constitution puts it.

The awards will take the form of plaques. Atkinson says that the ASUS executive would "like to see an Honour Board in the Red Room of Kingston Hall." He stresses that the awards "are not the same as the Tricolor Awards or the Arts '50 Scholarship." The awards could go to anyone in Arts and Science--from "drama, music, government, film--anything really. It could be in any one of the clubs, Camp Outlook, SVB, or that type of organization and it doesn't have to be one outstanding activity It could be a combination of a few".

The chairman of the Awards committee is John Ronson. Also on the committee is Dean Sinclair of Arts and Science, Honourary ASUS President P. Stoke, the four ASUS executives, and ASUS senator, the ASUS representative to the AMS and one DSC chairperson. Any professors, DSC people, volunteer organizations, AMS executives, club presidents or students from any faculty may suggest names for the committee to consider.

Nominations, complete with a supporting outline of their contributions, should be delivered to the A.S.U.S. Office, B-105 MacKintosh-Corry, before February 1, 1976.

Brockington visitorship

The Brockington Visitor for 1975-1976 will be Claude Ryan, a prominent French Canadian and editor of Le Devior. He will be on campus the week of March 8th.

The Brockington Visitorship was established in 1969 by Colonel R.S. McLaughlin, in commemoration of his good friend and long time rector of Queen's, Lenoard W. Brockington. Col. McLaughlin, an Oshawa industrialist, has been a generous benefactor of Queen's for many years.

A committee was established to invite a visitor of international reputation to the Queen's campus once a year. The visitor comes to Queen's for a week. He delivers a public lecture on a topic of his own choice and in the following days meets students and staff in seminars and informal gatherings.

The first Brockington Visitor was Lester B. Pearson, internationally respected Canadian statesman and recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize. Sir Bernard Lovell, director of Britian's Jodrell Bank Observatory, and Gunnar Myrdhal, a Swedish economist and one of the world's leading social scientists, came to Queen's in subsequent years.

R. Buckminster Fuller, inventor, engineer, mathematician and philosopher, fascinated and stimulated Queen's people of many disciplines in the fall of 1973.

The 1976-1977 visitorship has also been arranged Hohn Kenneth Galbraith will visit Queen's in the fall of 1976.

GRE & GMAT

Test changes

Educational Testing Service (ETS), Princeton, N.J., reports several major changes in two national testing programs whose scores are used as part of the admissions process in many of the nation's graduate schools.

Both programs, the newly-titled Graduate Management Admission Test (GMAT) and the Graduate Record Examinations (GRE), together test more than 400,000 prospective graduate students every year.

EST says the changes were made to help simplify the test-taking process by making it more accommodating for student candidates.

The GMAT formerly was called the Admission Test for Graduate Study in Business. The new name parallels a similar change in the sponsoring council's name -- reflecting a trend among graduate business schools to broaden their curricula and degree titles to include other areas of administration, as well as business.

The programme is developed and conducted by ETS for the Admission Council for Graduate Study in Management, a group representing 43 graduate schools of management.

There are several new additions to the GRE. For the first time, a full-length sample GRE aptitude test is available to give candidates an accurate view of the scope of the test and the type of questions it contains. The sample aptitude test may be ordered separately or as part of the Graduate Programs and Admissions Manual, which provides information about more than 500 institutions and their graduate programs

The aptitude test has also been shortened by five minutes from the former three-hour total. And an estimated additional 15 minutes of student time at the test centre has been saved by soliciting background information on the registration form rather than at the centre.

For the first time, GRE candidates will be allowed at the time of the test administration to delete or change the list of institutions to which scores are to be sent.

Both programs emphasize that walk-in registration for the GMAT and the GRE are being continued to provide a needed service to candidates who are unable to pre-register because of circumstances beyond their control.

Poet Birney captivates audience

Barbara Nyland

The Canadian poet Earle Birney captivated his audience of over 150 people as they listened to him read his poems on Wednesday night in John Watson Hall. Birney drew his audience through a wide range of emotions from satirical humour to sensitive description.

Birney's voice reflected the contents of his poems. He almost sang 'Daybreak' a work in which he expresses his feelings upon waking up as a child in the Canadian Rockies; what he calls "his religious gratitude to the sun".

Another poem imitated the sound of a train travelling between two stations in Britain. The tall, white bearded poet uttered the syllables which were literally incomprehensible during most of the poem but which conveyed the music of the regular clatter of the train on the tracks. The poet's voice carried the listeners over bridges and through tunnels. Sounds imitating train noises were blended with words commenting on the scenery and announcements by the conductor.

Birney served with the Canadian Army during World War Two. His first wife was Jewish and he stated that this gave him a strong personal interest in the outcome of the conflict. He now does not feel so akin to many of the poems he wrote during this period for they do not reflect his strong hatred of war. "I wrote things more confidently during the war. I felt that man would rise above the semi-civilized ape. Now I'm not so sure" Birney said. As an example of his war poetry Birney read 'The Road to Nijmegen'.

Birney's satirical humour was illustrated by Billboards build freedom of choice a poem which he started while driving down an Oregon highway and became disturbed by the "billboards which stuttered" that is the billboards which consistently repeated the same statement over and over again at intervals along the road. He therefore invented a hitchhiker to discuss the problem with and the poem resulted.

While commenting on his early development as a writer Birney stated that he first wanted to be a journalist but this ambition was squashed by a public school teacher who discovered Birney and two friends working on a gossip sheet about their town, Banff Alberta, during school time. The traditional consequenees followed. Instead Birney later entered university intending to beeome a chemical engineer but in his third year switched to English in which he finally obtained his Ph.D.

Earle Birney is now living in Toronto and working on what he calls his pseudo-biography. He describes the work as 80 percent truth and 20 pereent something else but comments that his is more interesting to read and write about with that structure.

. . . on The Palestine Question

Journal editors: bigots

Dear Editors:

In the January 8th edition of the Journal you carry what purports to be a news feature entitled "Zionism and the PLO: The Palestine Question". In the guise of presenting informed analysis and comment on an exceedingly complex set of issues we actually find the following:

A series of quotations 'explaining' Zionism by Dr. A. C. Forrest. This is the equivalent of using George Wallace as your authority on the black civil rights movement in the U.S., or Leonard Jones on French Canadian nationalism.

A reprint of the United Nations resolution presented without explanation of the diplomatic context in which it was framed and passed, without any indication of the national delegations which supported and opposed it. Instead it appears as an ex-cathedra moral judgement by the UNO rather than a tactic of international political combat.

A report of the speech by a representative of the PLO in Ottawa almost two months ago, which provides an exposition of the PLO position and program in its tidiest and most attractive public relations version.

A report, from an anonymous souree, purportedly describing the aetivities of "Zionist" demonstrators at the speech reported in the previous story, which in its tone and innuendos reporting the eom-ments of unidentified demonstrators is little more than a shabby anti-semitic slur.

A by-lined story on the harassment of Palestinians' by Canadian Immigration. While these bureaucratic aetions may be deplorable, it should be recognized that it is a matter of the administration of Canadian law and has no direet eonnection with Zionism or Israel.

What then has been accomplished by the publication of this "feature"? The enlightenment of the reader? Hardly. The intent here, by the selection and presentation of material, is to deceive and propagandize. This is all the more obvious since the Queen's Journal provides no indication that it intends to publish a presentation of the Zionist case. What the Journal has done is simply to indicate its participation in the ugly streak of anti-semitism that runs beneath the surface of Canadian society, even as Canadians wallow in self-congratulation over their "tolerance", "moderation", and "lack of prejudice". In their ignorance, irresponsibility and alas, bigotry, the editors of the Journal have perpetrated a truly racist act.

Resent spoon feeding

Dear Editors:

I was astounded, upon reading your report on "The Palestine Question", at the obvious pro-P.L.O. slant presented. Had the word "editorial" or "commentary" been placed over the group of artieles, I would not have been taken abaek. We are, after all, entitled to our own opinion. This series, though, was circulated as a supposedly objective indication of the problems between Israel and Palestinian "refugees".

As a member of the student body of an institution of higher learning, and a student of Middle Eastern studies for the past four years, I resent being fed a series of articles by a theoretically apolitical newspaper that by no means objeetively reflects both sides of the Middle Eastern dilemma.

I appreciated the "historical" section explaining the events leading up to the declaration of Zionism as a raeist philosophy I did not, though, find additional information describing the detractions and apologies of countries and organizations, after the vote was taken, for allowing the above motion to be passed Neither did t see any articles pointing to Arab countries' present bloody Christian vs. Moslem conflict, and maintenance, for over 25 years, of "seclusion" camps for Palestinians.

Your article utilizing the opinions of a virulent anti-Zionist in order to present a definition of Zionism was the epitome of journalistic irresponsibility. A.C.Forrest's views are in many cases not only simplistic but also false, without any historical or political validity. Considering his views vis-a-vis the state of Israel, did you actually expect objectivity?

I shall not continue to recite the errors and inequalities within "The Palestine Question"; let it be said that there are many. Remember, please, that a half-truth is also a half-lie.

I cannot believe that the editors of the Queen's Journal concocted this slanted hodgepodge for the purpose of expressing an opinion in the guise of factual reporting. I would rather blame this mistake on human error. Having brought this "misealculation" to your attention, though, I would expeet the Queen's Journal to present another report, in order to regain the equilibrium sadly lost.

Guilty of 'yellow' journalism

Dear Editors:

I would like to protest very vehemently your article "Zionism and the PLO" of Jan. 8. The Journal has chosen to print articles from different sources, however, it has completely shirked its responsibility to the students of this university to provide a fair and unbiased review of the question. The article proved entirely one-sided and slanted completely against Zionism. A Palestinian was chosen to explain the Palestine Liberation Organization but the explanation of Zionism did not even come from a Zionist. It came from a United Church spokesman who, besides being known as anti-semitic, has been condemned by many members, lay and clergy, of the United Church. In not even attempting a fair represcntation, the Journal, it seems, has taken sides in the issue, which is not the place for a campus newspaper The Journal, in this, is guilty of nothing less than "yellow" journalism.

t will not go into all the issues mentioned in the article as this was not the purpose of my letter, however there is one sentence that t simply refuse to let lie. You refer to the "forcible establishment of the state of Israel in 1948" and this is a blatant lie. You have forgotten that the Zionists accepted the 1947 Partition Plan of the UN (to partition Palestine between the Arabs and Jews), but the Arabs refused. When the Plan went into effect, Israel proclaimed independence for its part of the country and one of the elauses of the Israeli Declaration of Independence is a plea for the Arabs to stay and together to build up the country A few hours after independence, Israel was attaeked on all sides by the Arabs who told the Palestinian Arabs to leave the country so that they could come in and slaughter the Jews Unfortunately for those that fled, the Jews won the war. Thus, if the establishment of tsrael was forcible, it was only by vitrue of being attacked on all sides and it never tried to rid itself of the Palestinian Arabs.

If the Journal is to continue using "canned" news, then they at least owe it to us to attempt a fair representation, or at least say that this was not the view of the paper, as t would eertainly hope.

. . . 'OFS protest is legitimate'

Dear Editors:

I would like to respond to your editorial in the Jan. 13 issue entitled "Plaeard-waving only hurts us".

I fear you misconstrue!

As I have outlined both to your reporters and at the Outer Council meeting of Jan. 8, the Jan. 21st rally in Toronto is not, I repeat not a simple-minded, plaeard-waving, rock-throwing fiaseo. It is to be a well organized rally and march.

The tentative agenda is as follows:

2:15 panel discussion on the McKeough Report. Speakers to include:
OFS chairperson
NUS chairperson
a rep from the labour movement the president of Ryerson
a rep. from U of T SAC
a rep. from the York faculty a rep from the Community Colleges

3:30 a) March to Queen's Park

b) Meeting between OFS exeeutive and the Minister of Colleges and Universities and the opposition erities.

I think you can see from this agenda that the purposes behind the rally are threefold. The first is that students attending from all aeross the province will have a chance to hear a wide range of viewpoints on the report and its implications, and will be able to enter into a dialogue about them. The seeond is that students will have a chanee to express their feelings on these proposals to the public and to the government by their physieal presence. The third is that student representatives will be able to enter into a hopefully constructive diseussion on these issues of tuition inereases and loan programmes with those people who make the deeisions- the Minister and the opposition eritics.

I would like to briefly answer a few of your other eriticisms in the editorial before closing. You say quite correctly that we are at university to learnhow to think and this is indeed what both the OFS and the AMS are doing on these issues. OFS is presently preparing a detailed response to the McKeough Report to present to the government on the 21st. That report will certainly include reference to our considered opinion that education is a right and not a privilege, and should be aceessible to all. It will also inelude referenee to the faet that spending on post-secondary education has declined in the past five years as a proportion of provincial expenditures to the extent that Ontario now stands ninth as a provinee in terms of its per eapita spending on universities It will also include reference to the faet there is another way to reduce provincial debt and that is to increase revenue. In light of the fact that eorporate profits have increased dramatically over the past decade while corporate seetor eontributions have deelined proportionately as a source of provineial revenue, there will be a comment to the effect that the government ought to look to the corporate sector for inereased revenue before it denies students a university education.

The AMS is presently investigating some of these issues in that we are undertaking studies on student assistanee schemes in other countries, on eontingency repayment schemes, and on some of the "social" barriers to post-secondary education.

I apologize for the length of this letter, but I felt the issue deserved some clarification. I do feel that the McKeough Report deserves the serious consideration of all current and potential students and that those who come to Toronto with us will learn a great deal from the experience.

AMS External Affairs Commissioner

Hillel replies:

"Is there a Palestinian Question?"

The Palestine Question

Submitted by several members of the Hillel Jewish Students

Who are the members of the Palestine Liberation Organization and where did they get their right to claim the state of Israel as their own?

The objective of the P.L.O. has been defined as 'politicide', destruction of a state. But its ideology and actions testify that the objective goes beyond that and includes a genocidal intent which is limited only by lack of opportunity. One of their terrorist groups, the Fatah, states as a fact that "The act of liberation is...the obliteration of society...Besides wiping out the military force of the occupying Zionist state, it turns towards the destruction of the means of existence of the Zionist society...Armed violence must destroy the military, political, economic and financial institution of the occupying Zionist society..." And records show that they are trying to realize their goals; the murder of pilgrims in Lod airport, 1972; the murder of Israeli athletes at Munich, 1972; the murder of school-children and a family in the township of Maalot in 1974, etc, etc.

This Palestine Arab nationalism is a product of recent political current. Until the 1920's no such national community had ever existed in Palestine, so that the Jews were charged by both the Balfour Declaration and the League of Nations Mandate with guaranteeing the civil and religious rights of other inhabitants. Neither document mentions any other national claim or right to the area. But the fiction of Palestine Arab nationality is still being exploited. If the Palestinians were in fact a separate nationality, their anger over the past two decades would also be directed against Jordan and Egypt as well as Israel since it was these invading armies which captured, in 1948, a substantial portion of the territory allotted to the Palestine Arabs under the UN plan. The West Bank, for example was captured by the Jordanian army and added to their Kingdom while the Gaza Strip was seized by the Egyptians.

Disregarding the UN resolution, the Arabs not only invaded the partitioned land after Israel's Declaration of Independence, but also convinced the Arab population living within the Israeli boundaries to leave and join the Holy War against the Jews. When the Arab leaders promised them that they could soon return to reclaim their property, as well as that of the Jews, 590,000 Israeli Arabs moved to the areas seized by Egypt and Jordan. According to the 1946 British survey of Palestine, these Arab refugees had no legitimate claim to only 16.5 per cent of the land which belonged to what is now Israel and of the remainder, more than 70 per cent was legally passed on by the British mandatory government to Israel, while the other 11.9 per cent was owned by Jews and those Arabs who had stayed behind.

These displaced Arabs were not the only refugees. Israel absorbed 800,000 Jews from Arab countries and did so without the land, resources, or oil revenues of the Arab states. In Europe, after World War II, in India and Pakistan, and elsewhere, resettlement, not repatriation, proved to be the only workable solution for more than 25 million people. But the Arab leaders chose not to assume the burden of the resettlement of these people. They chose instead to use the Arab refugees as a political weapon against Israel. As a people in exile, they could be exploited by the group which calls itself the Palestine Liberation Organization in its conquest of Palestine.

The PLO is not a body elected by the Palestinian people, but an establishment founded in 1964 by Arab governments. At the Algiers Summit Conference of 1973, its creator - the Arab League - gave the organization the right of exclusive representation of the Palestinians. Its main concern is not the welfare of the Palestinian refugees. The PLO is instead a roof organization of Palestinian Fedayeon, an organization whose central activities are terrorist operations against Israel. The PLO states its objectives and political theory in its Palestinian National Covenant which has been referred to by the National Palestinian Council as its constitution. Here, they unequivocally deny the right of Israel to exist as a national entity. For instance, Section 19 asserts that "the partitioning of Palestine in 1947 and the establishment of Israel are fundamentally null and void." Section 20 denies that Jews are a national people with a right to statehood. Sections 2 and 21 assert that only Palestinians have the right to self determination. (This would eliminate 99 per cent of the population of the state of Israel.) According to Section 9, an armed struggle, which is defined as primarily a terrorist operation, is proposed as the only possible road to the freedom of Palestine. Section 15 asks the Arabs "to purge the Zionist presence from Palestine."

These are their organizational goals and policies. The PLO must fabricate means of gaining world support and sympathy as a group aimed at establishing a Palestinian state which would supplant Israel; at the same time, they must appear as though they did not wish to threaten the identity and existence of Israelis. Their answer is expressed in the slogan promoting the establishment of a "democratic secular Palestine, in which Moslems, Christians and Jews would live on equal terms." This slogan was composed for external propaganda purposes only, as is clearly evident in the discussion of the matter by representatives of the PLO in Beirut in March 1970. The principal points of this discussion were published in the Lebanese newspaper, Al-Anwar by Shafik Al-hout: He says: 1) a Democratic Palestine is purely a slogan, intended for practical and propoganda purposes. Its chief objective is to give the impression that the organization does not plan to throw the Jews in the sea, but only plans to eliminate the State of Israel and found a new state in its place. 2) Most of the Jews remaining in Palestine after the conquest would be required to go back to their countries of origin. 3) The intention of the PLO is to found an Arab Palestinian State, and not a bi-national one. Further proof of the baseless fiction in their slogan is provided in its examination in the light of Arab reality. There is no state in the entire Arab world which defines itself as secular. On the contrary, all of the Arab States, with the exception of Syria and Lebanon, define themselves in their constitution as Moslem. The definition of a secular state by religious components is typical of this empty promise.

The Palestinian problem is not the problem of a nation expelled from its land since most Palestinians still live within the bounds of mandated Palestine. It is not the problem of a homeless people, since most Palestinians still live in their homes, and it is also not a problem of refugees since only 20 per cent of the Palestinians still live in refugee camps. The Arab-Israeli conflict is essentially national and not religious. This continued emphasis on religious differences reflects the unwillingness of the PLO to recognize Israel as a reality of the Jewish national entity.

What is Zionism?

There is no basis for Arab claims that Zionism is racist and exclusivist. Actually Zionism was a revolutionary movement against racism and oppression. Zionism is the movement to secure a homeland for the Jewish nation. To say that Zionism would stand in the path of the achievement of the same cry of other people is a contradiction in terms. Israel does not object to any reasonable plan to help its surrounding neighbours. But it cannot accept an Arab proposal to bring an end to Israel. This would be national suicide and no nation would accept such a course of action.

The land of Israel originally played an important part in the religious life of Jews. After the exile, the Jewish people were scattered, and in their new homes were subjected to religious and racial persecution. Zionism as a movement of returning to Zion, became an agent to preserve Jewish existence. This spurred the development of a political Zionist movement aimed at helping Jewish refugees find peace and security in their own land.

Political Zionism was founded in the middle of the 19th century, but the movement did not formally organize until 1897 at the first Zionist convention held in Basel, Switzerland. Along with the Balfour Declaration, announcing Britain's support of the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, the machinery was set up for the creating of an independent Arab State in Palestine. The fulfilment of the British promise to the Arabs resulted in the establishment of Transjordan to rule Palestine.

The promise to the Jews of Palestine was not fulfilled. The British buckled under Arab political and terrorist pressure to restrict Jewish immigration during the 1930's and '40's. Jews fleeing the impending doom in Hitler's Europe were not allowed sanctuary in Israel. Many were sent back to Europe, back to the gas chambers.

When the UN finally voted for the Partition, the Jewish body accepted this proposal, even though it gave Israel a piece of land that was exposed on every side. In 1948, the armies of all the surrounding Arab countries attacked.

Zionism's main function today is the mobilization of money and support for Israel. The World Zionist Federation is also very involved in the efforts to free Russian and Syrian Jews. Zionism is a movement for the gathering of the Jewish people. The State of Israel has always enjoyed democratic government. There is religious freedom for the Drouze, the different Christian communities, and for the Moslem Arabs living in Israel. All Palestinians who were citizens of Israel before 1967 still enjoy full Israeli citizenship. They have the right to free government, education, voting, religious freedom and equality along with all other Israeli citizens. Arab towns are governed by Arab leaders and there is Arab representation in the Israeli parliament.

Zionism was not born in the Jewish ghettos of Europe, but on the battlefield against imperialism in ancient Israel. It is not an outmoded nationalistic revival but an unparalleled epic of centuries of resistance to force and bondage. Those who attack it, attack the fundamental principles and provisions of the United Nations Charter.

Implications of the UN Vote

When the state of Israel was created by the UN partition of 1947, the surrounding Arab states vowed that they would not rest until Israel was driven into the sea. When Israel stood fast after three wars and two and a half decades, they realized that physical force alone could not achieve this goal. The Arabs then reorganized their strategy. The first phase of their new plan was to be the expulsion of the State of Israel from the UN, or, at the very least, its suspension from the General Assembly. But when this also appeared unattainable, they instituted the attack on Zionism. After the General Assembly adopted the third committee's resolution equating Zionism and racism, they approached the fulfillment of their goals.

Accusations of racism have plagued the Jewish people since the dawn of history. Yet these same people sympathized with and supported other persecuted groups. During World War II, a Jewish Brigade of Israeli volunteers fought with the Allies. Contrast this with the Arabs who, far from joining the Allies, offered their services to Hitler, an avowed racist and patron of the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. More recently, the Jewish community of the U.S. was one of the first and definitely the most vocal minority group supporting the American Negroes when they began their struggle for paper equality. The arrest sheets are filled with names of American Jewish students who marched and chained themselves to fences in support of the civil rights cause.

It is this same group which is today accused of being racist. We cannot allow ourselves to believe that this shameful, benighted and arbitrary decision is really directed, as the Arabs claim, against the Zionists. Examined in its proper perspective, adherence to a resolution condemning Zionism means adherence to anti-Semitism and the legitimization of aggression against Israel, an Israel which grants equal protection, in practise as well as in theory, to all of its citizens, regardless of religion.

Contrast this with the Arab camp, in which several of the leading countries have recorded, and are continuing to record, to their own discredit, the brutal suppression of national and religious minorities - not only on Syrian Jewry, but also the Kurds of Iraq, and the Christians in Lebanon and southern Sudan.

Rather than examine the effects of the vote on Zionism, it is much more crucial at this point, to reflect on the consequences to the UN as an organization designed to promote world peace, security and to further social progress. We are presently witnessing a step-by-step self-destruction of the UN as it alienates enlightened individual groups and nations the world over. We must make ourselves aware of the prejudices prevailing among many members of the assembly and of the irrelevant considerations of many of the delegations and of the widespread fear and cowardice in the face of Arab pressure in the assembly. Any proposal presented by the Arab countries or their allies, no matter how absurd, gains a large automatic majority.

The only way we can possibly reverse this erosion in the UN is to take a stand as Canadians for our beliefs, against all forms of blackmail, such as the recent oil diplomacy. If we care enough, we must condemn this foul assault and dissociate ourselves from this preposterous attempt to cast a slur on Zionism. If we don't care enough to speak up, the slur is not on Zionism, but on the rest of the civilized world, which will one day be ashamed of its part in this deplorable resolution. Let us vote with our minds and our hearts, and not with our pockets.

Editor's Note: This article was submitted by several members of the Hillel Jewish Students in response to the Canadian University Press feature, "The Palestine Question: Zionism and the PLO". This article is an attempt to provide the other side of the story and is in no way, neither was the previous feature, the policy of Queen's Journal.

Mom's Menu

Your Mother

In cold weather like this, there is nothing better than a good hot stew. It is also something which can be improvised when being prepared, so that it is a good "end-of-week's-money" type of meal. The major cost is the meat itself. But if you really want to stretch your budget, you can easily substitute larger quantities of vegetables and use less meat.

Beef Stew (preparation time - 1 hr. 15 min.)

Boneless stewing beef (¼ to ½ lb. per person)

1 tbsp. margarine
¼ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
3 - 4 cups water potatoes (1 med. per person) celery (1 med. per person) carrots (1 lge. per person)
onions (1 med.)

Cut meat into small pieces. Melt margarine in a 2 quart pot. Brown meat on all sides. Add salt and pepper. Pour in water and cover pot. Simmer for 45 minutes.

Cut up potatoes, carrots and celery into small pieces. Dice onion. Add vegetables to stew. (Other vegetables may be added as well. Try peas, beans or any other vegetables which you might have leftover from previous meals.) Simmer another 15 - 20 minutes or until vegetables are tender.

Try a thin stew stock served with bread or the stock may be thickened with flour or cornstarch. Shake a tablespoon of either with ½ cup of water in a jar and stir stew while adding.

Serve the stew with a salad and bread.

A survey of Kingston stores this week produced the following prices on the main ingredients in this recipe. Special prices are marked and dashes indicate that the items were not in stock when prices were checked.

Music in the making

New Music Concerts, Toronto's unique series of fascinating and unusual sounds, is to give a concert in Grant Hall, on Monday, 19th of January at 8:00 p.m. The Music Department of Queen's is only able to offer this exciting event admission-free because the New Music Concerts series is supported by the National Touring Office of the Canada Council and the Ontario Arts Council.

The programme features the music of one of Britain's foremost contemporary composers, Peter Maxwell Davies, who will personally conduct three of his most recent works: "Fiddlers at the Wedding"; "16th Century Scottish Dances"; and "L'Homme Armé". In addition, the young Quebec composer, Claude Vivier, will conduct his work for seven female voices "Chants".

Some twenty-three performers taking part in the programme, include: Robert Aitken, flute; Mary Morrison, soprano; Patricia Rideout, contralto; Bill Bridges, guitar; William Kuinka, mandolin; David Zafer, violin; and Stan McCartney, clarinet.

Peter Maxwell Davies was born in Manchester, England, in 1934. He was educated in Leigh Grammar School, the Royal Manchester College of Music, and upon winning an Italian Government Scholarship in 1957, he studied with Godfredo Petrassi in Rome. His first orchestral work "Probation for Orchestra", won the 1958 Olivetti Prize. For three years he was Director of Music of Cirencester Grammar School where he implemented a highly original approach to teaching young people to make music. His methods produced such successful and interesting results that his services as a lecturer have been much in demand ever since. A prolific composer, Peter Maxwell Davies now lives in the remote islands of the Orkneys. His music, world renowned through recordings and performances, has been acclaimed for its great imagination, power and subtelty. An esteemed performer, conductor and lecturer, Davies is founding director of the famed ensemble "The Fires of London".

Claude Vivier, is a young Quebec composer whose works have been performed in France and Canada is recognized as a unique talent of considerable stature.

Woody Herman speaks

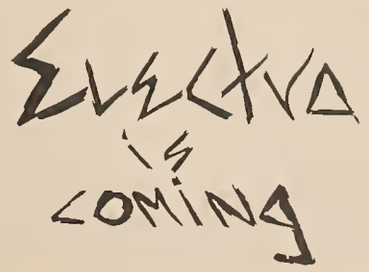
One of the most thoroughly successful and popular band leaders of all time will bring a group of outstanding musicians to Kingston's Grand Theatre on January 20th. If this band is anything like the one he brought here a couple of years ago, it will be a concert that you will long remember.

Woody Herman has always had good bands. The urge to create, to develop and communicate musically remains as strong within him today as it was when he first started as a hoofer in vaudeville over fifty years ago. During the late twenties and early thirties, Woody played clarinet and saxophone with different types of bands. And after he became leader he kept on fronting different types of bands, too. First the band that played the blues; then the band that played like Duke Ellington; then the roaring, romping First Herd; then the more subdued, super-talented Second Herd; then the bop-filled Third Herd, and then more and more Herds, constantly changing in style, constantly evolving into something new and different, invariably keeping up with the times like no other band has ever kept up with them, culminating in the early seventies in a completely, rock-tinged, kid-oriented, yet still-roaring Herd.

Why the constant changes? "If I thought there weren't any more challenges - just doing one thing over and over again, and maybe polishing it just a little more and taking another tune and making it sound like that - in other words, looking for fresh material so that I can make it sound like old material - I would have thrown in the towel for real."

The amazing progress of popular music during the past ten years thrills him. Credit must go, he feels, to some of today's music education systems. "They're fantastic. What a kid can learn today in two or three semesters used to take us years to figure out. This is especially true if the kid happens to be in the right school, like Berklee, which is a fantastic place, or in the music departments of some universities. Yes, you're right, a lot of today's instructors are musicians out of the Big Band Era - or at least devotees of it. It's a whole different world we're living in. The stage band project alone covers thousands of high schools and thousands of colleges in all parts of the country. What is a stage band? It's nothing more than a big band. Many kids have become deeply involved in this sort of music. Some have gone on to rock groups, and that's why we have some rock groups that have gone way beyond the scope of earlier rock groups."

The innovations in music thrill Woody even more. "So many of the barriers have been taken down. So many of the limitations have been wiped out. There are many changes of tempi, and odd amounts of bars, both unheard of during the big band days. Now you can do any damn thing you want, if you have the courage and the ability, and young composers and young writers and young arrangers are proving it every day. And as their music improves, the players have to improve, or else they can't play it. It's not easy; in fact it's damn difficult. But it's much more fun, because the challenge is there again. As long as there's a challenge, then it's fun . . . But it was in 1902, too. Right? Then it was a challenge to get born!"



Woody Herman - there's just no telling what will happen next

Unlike some other Big Band Era leaders, Woody digs many of the young composers and he especially likes the new jazz sounds. How many other big band leaders will admit as much? Hardly any. But how many have kept up with today's sounds? Hardly any. Woody has. And he obviously relishes them. "Some of the things the guys in my band are writing and playing right now are positively phenomenal, and they're just beginning to scratch the surface. There's just no telling what will happen next."

And which, of all the many and completely different-sounding bands he has led, is Woody's all-time favorite? "That's simple," says the man who refuses to grow old. "It's the band I'm going to have next year!"

Much of this article consists of excerpts from THE BIG BANDS by George T. Simon published in 1971 by Collier-Macmillan Canada Ltd.

McArthur to do Threepenny Opera

The students of the Drama Department of the Faculty of Education, Queen's University, are presently rehearsing their production for the spring season, Bertol Brecht's THE THREEPENNY OPERA.

Casting has been completed with the role of Macheath (Mack the Knife) being played by Howard Hughes, who played a leading role as Macduff in McArthur's fall production of MACBETH. Jean Callum, who was Maria in the recent Kinsmen production of THE SOUND OF MUSIC, plays Lucy Brown, one of Macheath's girlfriends. Jenny Diver, Mack's most notorious girlfriend, is played by Susie Harrington, who took the part of Mazeppa in the Queen's Musical Theatre's production of GYPSY last year.

Performances will begin at 8:30 p.m. on Wednesday, March 24th and end on Saturday, March 27th. Ticket prices are $2.00 for adults and $1.00 for students. Performances will take place in McArthur auditorium.

G.B.S. loves P.C.

Theatre 5's first production of the New Year is also their first venture for some time into the field of work written and published by a writer not connected with the company. Dear Liar is a theatrical biography of Jerome Kilty. It is the story of the intriguing relationship between two people of genius, the Irish playwright George Bernard Shaw, and the Anglo-Italian actress, Mrs. Patrick Campbell.

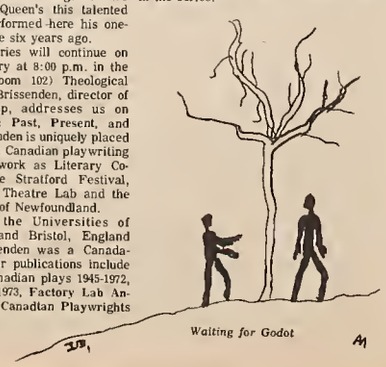
She was at the height of her powers when they met, while he had merely begun his great career. He fell in love with her and began an amazing correspondence - dozens of letters which they both saved, fought over and eventually published. Dear Liar has been created for the stage from this correspondence. Mrs. Patrick Campbell created the part of Eliza Doolittle in Shaw's 'Pygmalion'. It was her last triumph and his first. When she died in the South of France a few days before the Germans entered Paris in 1940, Shaw wrote of her 'everyone is greatly relieved, herself most of all I should think, for she could not live with real people in the real world - still, she was a great enchantress, and she enchanted me among the rest'. In Theatre 5's production, Gordon Robertson plays George Bernard Shaw, and Valerie Robertson is Mrs. Patrick Campbell. The dates of the production are, Friday and Saturday evenings at 9p.m. from January 16th until February 14th.

January 24th sees the opening of our 1976 season of Theatre for Young People, at 2 p.m. on Saturdays. The first production is 'Tell it Again'.....how many ways can you tell a story? During 1975 these productions have proved very popular as birthday celebrations.

Anyone wishing to contribute stories, letters, diary excerpts etc., to Theatre 5's Eastern Ontario Documentary entitled 'Sittin on a Snake-Rail Fence, scheduled for March, should send the material c-o Mrs. Diane Gordon, Theatre 5, P.O. Box No 1221, Kingston, or call her or any member of the group at 546-5460 if you would like material photo-copied, or would like us to make a tape-recording of your contributions as an interview.

The Ham in Sam

This afternoon at 4:00 p.m. in Convocation Hall the Departments of Drama, English and French proudly present The Ham in Sam: an actor's perspective of the works of Samuel Beckett. This lecture will be delivered by internationally known actor Maurice Good. Mr. Good trained in his native Ireland and in England where he has performed at the Abbey, Gate and Old Vic theatres. Now a resident of Canada, Mr. Good has appeared with Theatre Calgary, CBC and most recently with the Shaw festival.



With a career-long interest in Beckett he has at one time played each of the roles in Waiting for Godot and is currently preparing the role of Hamm in the Citadel's production of Endgame. We welcome back to Queen's this talented artist who last performed here his one-man show on Synge six years ago.

The lecture series will continue on Tuesday; 20 January at 8:00 p.m. in the Studio Theatre (room 102) Theological Hall when Connie Brissenden, director of Playwrights Co-op, addresses us on Canadian Theatre: Past, Present, and Future. Ms. Brissenden is uniquely placed to speak on current Canadian playwriting by virtue of her work as Literary Co-ordinator with the Stratford Festival, Toronto's Factory Theatre Lab and the Mummer's troupe of Newfoundland.

Educated at the Universities of Guelph, Alberta and Bristol, England (where Ms. Brissenden was a Canada-Britain fellow), her publications include two indexes of Canadian plays 1945-1972, The Doukhobors, 1973, Factory Lab Anthology, 1974, and Canadian Playwrights of the 1970's, 1975.

The third speaker in the series, Richard Courtney, will speak on The Discipline of Drama, Thursday, 22 January at 8:15 p.m. in the Studio Theatre (room 102) Theological Hall. Theatre Consultant, Teacher, Author, Member of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Professor Courtney is one of Canada's most distinguished experts in the field of developmental drama, and pioneered the Bachelor of Education degree in Drama in England.

Arrangements have not yet been concluded with other speaker in the series. Robin Phillips, Douglas Rain, and Bill Glassco hopefully will be appearing later in the series.

Waiting for Godot

Tina Shepard as Electra and Shami Chaikin as Clytemnestra from Sophocles' Electra on route to Kingston.

ELECTRA IS COMING

Chaikin/Montgomery show on way to Queen's

Queen's Department of Drama in association with St. Lawrence and McArthur colleges proudly present the Joseph Chaikin production of Sophocles' Electra.

Based on Sophocles' tragedy, playwright Robert Montgomery and Obie award winning director Joseph Chaikin (founder of the Open Theatre) created this poetic version of the Electra legend. The exiled Orestes and his sister Electra murder their mother Clytemnestra in revenge for the killing fifteen years earlier of their father. This highly charged drama is the purest of tragedies, spanning the scope of joy, passion, fear and self-pity.

The cast includes Paul Zimet, Tina Shepard and Shami Chaikin, all of whom have toured with the Open Theatre through the U.S., Canada, Europe and the Mid-East, and performed on C.B.S. T.V. as well as National Educational Television.

Electra is touring North America in early 1976 following its New York run. Critics' comments include:

New York Times, Walter Kerr:

The most successfully adventurous of American experimental directors (is) Joseph Chaikin...If we are to make new magic out of old, Mr. Chaikin is the man to keep an eye on.

New York Village Voice, Michael Feingold:

The root of the drama is captured and held up for all to see...the concentration is on the deepest inner impulses, and the effect of the production is to convey the purity of Sophocles ..the experience is extreme in its pureness and command . I commend it as a most important event.

Yale-Theatre, Ellen Blumenthal:

Absolute precision...the literary merits of the script are coupled with a strong stage sense...the script is a tight poetic work

Performance is scheduled for Wednesday, February 4, 1976, at 8:30 P.M. in McArthur Auditorium. Tickets: Students - $2.50 and $3.50; Non-Students; $3.50 & $4.50. For further information contact 547-6194.

NOTICE

PARKING ENFORCEMENT

Effective January 1, 1976, the penalty for illegal parking will be increased from five dollars per infraction to ten dollars. (Removal of mechanical wheel locking device). This increase is necessary to defer illegal parking in what will be a very tight parking situation. Because of a substantial loss of surface parking spaces to construction, and the high demand for parking permits it is imperative that all available parking space be protected for permit holders.

Saturday there is a women's Figure Skating Competition. The fifth Annual Queen's Invitational will be held all day in Harty. Men play Volleyball–Section I of the OUA at Bartlett and Ross all day. Women play hockey that afternoon at 4:30. At 7:00 on Saturday the women play basketball in Bartlelt against Waterloo. Should be exciting so come on out and support your teams.

Away

On Friday the men play Badminton at Ryerson and Squash at York. These two day tournaments continue in both sports on Saturday. Also on Saturday the women attend a track meet at Cornell and a Swim Meet at Guelph. The men go to RMC for wrestling, Cornell for Indoor Track and Field, and Ottawa for Hockey.

Round-up

The men's and women's Basketball teams travelled to Ottawa on Tuesday to play the Raven's and Robins at Carleton. The Gals won 38-29. The Gaels lost 85-74 Queen's played Hockey at RMC on Wednesday. The final score was 5-2 for the Redmen.

Figure Skating

Kathy Todd

The Queen's Figure Skating Team will be hosting an Invitational Figure Skating tournament this Saturday in the Jock Harty arena. This day-long competition has been won by Queen's for the last three years. Queen's also has a championship record, having won the OWIAA competition for the last three years, but more than half of the team graduated last year and so this year's team is very new.

Despite hard work by the Queen's team, and much progress, the team has been plagued with injuries, and is not skating at full strength. Nancy Drysdale, the coach, has been working with the team since October along with manager Kathy Todd, and they are hoping for a good showing tomorrow. In the solo categories, Queen's is entering Cathy Rigsby and Deb Johnson in Novice Ladies, Johanna Flipsen and Jan McGillivray in Junior Ladies, Marilyn Snell and Pattie Shirokoff in Intermediate Ladies, and Vicky Cleworth in Senior Ladies. The interpretive category, in which the competitors make up a solo on the spot to specific music they have not heard before, is being entered by Pattie Shirkoff in Juniors, and Vicky Cleworth in Seniors.

The competition will also include ladies pairs, and Queen's is entering Johanna Flipsen and Jan McGillivray at the Junior Pair level, and Pattl Shirkoff and Marilyn Snell in Novice Similar; Jan McGillivray and Johanna Flipsen in Junior Similar Dance; and Marilyn Snell and Patti Shiroff in Senior open. Entered in Mixed Dance and in Junior Larry Bencze and Marilyn Snell.

The organizational work for this meet has been done by Carol Fuller. She was selected Mrs. Mead, Matthews, and Bullock, all high calibre judges in the C.F.S.A. to judge. Entry forms to date have been received from McMaster and U of T, our ancient rivals.

With lots of enthusiasm, Queen's is entering this Saturday's Invitational so support Queen's and come watch the competition in the Jock Harty Arena from 8am till 4pm on Saturday. See you there!

Bews News

Interfaculty Hockey

Paul Findlay

Last weekend the Interfaculty Hockey Tournament was held. Anyone who came out to watch was treated to some excellent hockey. In the first round Arts beat Grads 7-2, Commerce edged Engineering in double overtime, in a very good game, 3-2, Law beat Education, 5-2, and Meds shut out P.H.E., 3-0. Since every team was guaranteed two games, the first round did not eliminate anyone. The second round was played Saturday afternoon. Law all but tied the game in the last minute, but lost to Engineering 2-1. Commerce blanked Education, 2-0, and Arts crushed P.H.E., 7-0. In the semi-finals defending champs Arts nipped Commerce, 4-3 and Engineering took Meds 5-2. In the finals Engineering beat Arts in a very fine game, 3-1. Brian Mori scored two for the winners, John Shirokoff adding one. Dean Manjuris scored for Arts. All in all it was a very successful tournament. Thanks to Jim Henderson for organizing it and to all the referees who gave up a lot of their weekend. Congratulations to Engineering as well as the other teams for showing us excellent hockey.

Ball Hockey, Basketball, Curling, Waterpolo and Bowling all have started. In early Ball Hockey action: Education 6, Electrical 5; Bus Grads 8, Law '77 2; Comm '78 9, Chemical 5; Arts '78 7, Comm '79 5; Law '76 8, Law '78 2; Arts '77 8, Comm '76 2; Comm '77 1, Civil 1; Mech 8, Arts '79 3; Mech 5, Arts '78 2; Mining 4, Elect. 1; Bus. Grads 5, Meds 1; Arts '76 8, Chem. 1. I have it on reliable authority that Bus. Grads and Mechanical are teams to watch as well as last year's runners-up Arts '76 and, of course, the champions for the last two years, Arts '77.

Broomball and Hockey, of course, are continuing. Badminton, Handball and Table Tennis have started. Double Handball entries are due next Wednesday and Doubles Badminton on Thursday.

The Cross-country Skiing meet will be held in the evening of Monday the 26th. The course will be at West Campus and is approximately 5-8 kilometres long. Entries are due next Tuesday at 9:00 a.m. Entries are limited to 5 per unit. If you are interested in competing, get in touch with your stick and get him to enter you.

Bews standing have been changed by the addition of participation points for Curling, Ball Hockey, Waterpolo and Handball Singles. There is no change in the positions of the top 10 teams:

1.	Comm '76	38082
2.	Arts '77	36641
3.	PHE	35760
4.	Comm '77	30547
5.	Civil-Math	28268
6.	Law '77	28036
7.	Arts '76	27582
8.	Bus Grads	27168
9.	Mechanical	26576

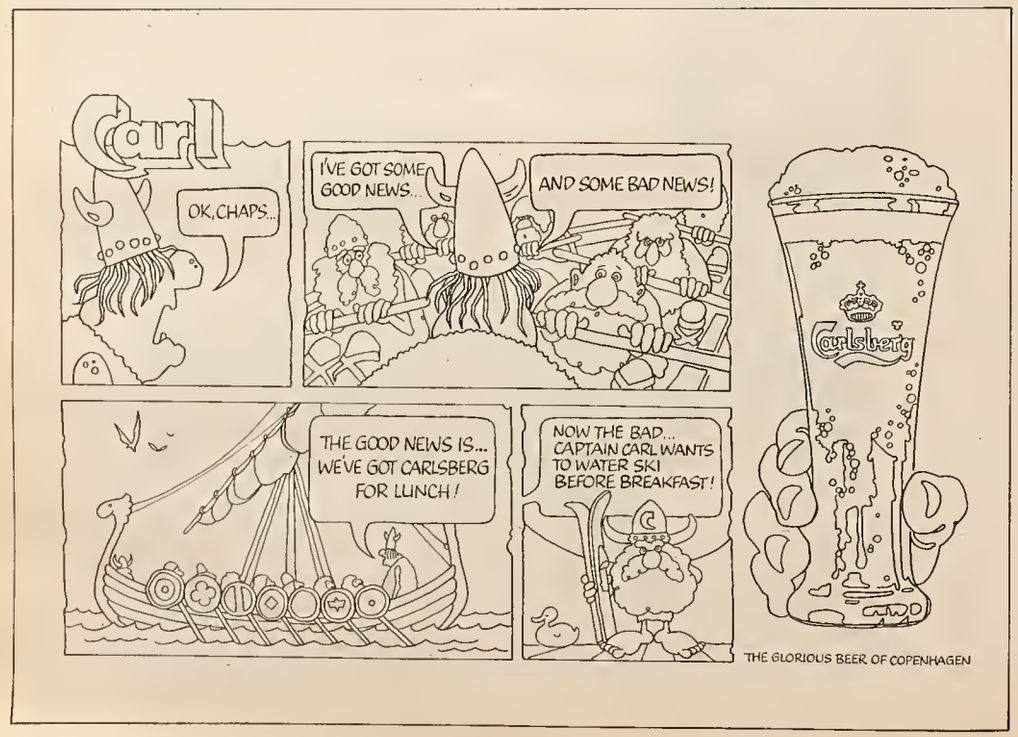
Grapplers trounce Gals

Z. Scafarelli

For the second consecutive year, the Golden Grapplers were able to defeat the Hockey Gals. In a wide open game on the evening of Tuesday, January 14 the Grapplers scored an 8-4 victory to improve upon their 4-1 mark of the year before. A huge crowd of twenty witnessed the exciting clash of brute strength between these two outstanding inter-collegiate teams.

The wrestlers were able to seore first. Early in the first period, Randy White drew a two minute penalty for high sticking. While he was in the penalty box, the Grapplers were able to score two short handed goals. The first goal was scored by Doug Renwicke with an assist going to Al Stewart. Larry Duchene picked up the second Gaels goal. This time assists went o Doug Renwicke and Al Stewart.



The leading scorer for the Grapplers was Doug Renwicke with 2 goals and 3 assists. Closely following him was Al Stewart with 2 goals and 2 assists, while Seiji Ohtake added 2 assists. Single goals went to Kevin McAllister, Ron "Crash" Craddock and Larry Duchene. Although Larry Pearson only had one assist, he nevertheless came close on many scoring opportunities as did Doug Swerbrick.

The Gals also had many stars. The most outstanding perhaps was Sue Wright who scored two goals. Late in the third period, she was also able to poke check Doug Renwicke on a breakaway to prevent a probable goal. Jan Atkinson was the leading point-getter for the Gals as she picked up three assists. Single goals went to Rhonda Leeman and Anne Simes.

There was a surprising lack of penalties in the hard checking, rock-em sock-em contest. White picked up both penalties for the Grapplers. The Gals sole penalty went to Cook.

The match-up was beneficial to both teams. For the Gals it provided a warm-up match for their game this weekend against Western which will be played Saturday, January 17 in Jock Harty Arena at 4:30 The Gals for this game will have a few stars who missed the contest against the Grapplers. These include Jeanean Gerow, Marg Bartlett and Karen Scully. This game is crucial for the Gals who are currently in fourth place with 2 wins, 2 losses and a tie. However, at this point only 3 points separate first from fourth place. With a win Saturday the Gals could improve their place in the standings. Come on out and give them the support which they deserve.

For the Grapplers, it provided an evening of fun and entertainment. This weekend the Gaels will be travelling to London to compete in the Western Open on Sunday, January 18. Western traditionally has a very strong team and are the defending OUAA champions.

Gals clip Robins wings; advance

Returning on a cold, blowy, wintry night from the Nation's Capital, Queen's teams managed only a split on the Basketball court.

The Gals played the Carleton Robins at 6:15 Tuesday night to a 38-29 victory. The Gaels fell to an 85-74 defeat at the hands of the Ravens.

The action in the Gals game was far from fast and furious. It was obvious from the start that the Queen's team was by far superior, although the score seesawed back and forth throughout the first half. As in the weekend before, this game was very defensive with neither team getting the opportunity to shoot very many hoops. Queen's shooting percentage was 30 from the floor and they looked good on the boards pulling down well over half of the rebounds. Carleton showed no pizzaz until the final two minutes of the game, and as per usual Queen's tended to play to Carleton's calibre which is another reason for the lacklustre game and resultant score.

Not much else can be said for the game except that the team has improved greatly and the game Tuesday did not show their talent aptly. Queen's spectators should look forward to an exciting game Saturday night at 7:00 in Bartlett.

See more on the Basketball Gaels and Gals in Tuesday's Journal.

Editor's Note: The article on the men's basketball team will be seen in Tuesday's Journal. It was preferred by the team that this game be presented with the weekend's games in a single article.

Splish splash

On Saturday afternoon the Annual International Innertube Waterpolo Competition was held in the Queen's Pool. The teams competing were Europe, China, the West Indies, India and an International team composed mainly of Canadian students. Unfortunately the West Indies and India lost first round games by default. The first meeting was between the Internationals and China which ended in a 5-0 win for the Internationals. Then the International team took on Europe and swamped them 4-1. The winners already being decided left two teams to fight for second place. This resulted in a 10-2 win for Europe over China. The competition was organized by the International Club and will be followed in early February by the Annual International Table Tennis Tournament.

The Golden Hockey Gaels were not so golden as they let drop a 5-2 game to the Redmen of RMC. Can you believe it??

baby-face

The Headless Horseperson goes up for two points in the Gals 38-29 victory over the Carleton Ravonettes.

Hockey Gaels stink out RMC

Toni Shand

Wednesday night the R.M.C. Redmen defeated the Queen's Golden Gaels 5 to 2 at the Frank Constantine Arena. Redmen scorers were Switzer, Istchenko, Macleod with singles, with Galloon pottins a pair. Aubrey and Arnoldi scored for the Gaels. Gaels opened and closed the scoring with the Redmen scoring five times in between.

The Gaels have a tremendous amount of talent but are a long way from being winners. With only a few exceptions most of the team doesn't seem to care whether they win or lose. The team is capable of playing superb hockey as they proved to Toronto but consistency is the mark of a winner and our current record of five wins and five losses accurately reflects the Gaels' inconsistency. The loss to R.M.C. is certainly not an isolated event as there have been few games this year in which all the Gaels have given 100 percent for three periods. I can name on the fingers of one hand those whose play has indicated that they really want to win.

Tim Hansen, Willie Wing, Geoff Arnoldi, and Chris Clark and perhaps a couple of others are hard workers who won't give up, however this competitive drive has not spread through the ranks.

John Cerre and Bill White are assistant captains but based on their performance Wednesday night they should be stripped of this honour and there were many who were as bad or worse.

Before the game, Willie Wing expressed the fear that the Gaels might stink out the place. His teammates certainly complied in grand style with an absolutely listless first period, followed by two periods of fighting the puck and watching the Redmen make them look sick. Unfortunately, Camel Harris had another off game and Redmen goaltender Rodger Hitesman held off the Gaels on the rare shift when they threatened to score.

Doug Grills was ejected from the game for spearing at the beginning of the third period, an act which is absolutely inexcusable no matter how frustrated a player gets. Steve Aubrey also was kicked out of the game as he failed to score on a breakaway, then started a fight which did not inspire the Gaels but left them with only three regular defencemen.

If Gaels don't soon come to the realization that they are only as good as they play they won't get a chance to display their talents in post-season play. The season is half over tht the toughest half is coming and will test the Gaels, even at their best.

The Gaels have the talent to be champions but have not yet shown the necessary guts and desire.

Assessment now due

This year's AMS election has produced three teams to date - not an empty achievement in itself when one considers the past few years. The appearance of more than three candidates on the scene is not only to be applauded on the axion "the more the merrier", but rather for its implications. Regardless of who wins, the basic issues facing students will receive a much needed airing. At last students will be given the opportunity to decide what those issues should be and what stance should be taken on them. Recent elections have been utterly deficient in this area primarily due to the lack of forum which necessarily arises out of confrontation politics; last year's AMS executive was acclaimed.

A useful start might be to examine some of these issues closely:

The AMS support of the Ontario Federation of Students. Such support entails the demand for free tuition and a cost of living stipend for students. It embraces also the policy of universal accessibility to university. Will this policy compromise the quality of post-secondary education?

The growth of student government. Should the AMS retain its emphasis on providing and administering the many student services? Such services have proliferated and now include many social services. The case of ex-AMS President John Gray has (perhaps unjustifiably) led to the suggestion that the AMS has become too complex for a student to handle adequately.

A perennial issue, yet one by no means solved is that of the communication between the AMS executive and its constituents. That so many students are unaware of the policies of the AMS is itself an indication that improvements in this area are called for.

The Quality of Education. This issue is especially close to the hearts of students these days (or so one likes to think) and it is thus imperative that the in-coming AMS executive establish a firm position on the quality of education at Queen's. The University's policy of tenure provides one important aspect to be considered.

The state of library acquisitions and management are also included in the issue of quality of education. Are good books and up-to-date periodicals readily available?,

The above is merely a cursory glance at some of the issues students should be starting to think about. A failure to do so on their part will make the consequences theirs to live with.

Socialist candidates

The three socialist candidates are representatives chosen rather arbitrarily from a collective of ten students pictured here. Ross Sutherland said that if they win the election, the group as a whole would run the AMS, and the executive team would be a "triumverate."

Copeland's churchmouse

In the next two weeks, we are going to be inundated by massive amounts of campaign material in the AMS and Faculty Society Elections. Rarely, if ever, will the candidates talk about the purpose of their organization, for it is issues, not purpose, that theoretically catch the voter's eye. It is worthwhile, therefore, to work towards a philosophy of our student government, the AMS. To examine the role and the purpose of the AMS in the university, in a concise manner, is needed in the face of the annual campaign slogan of "we need better Communication."

At one time in the recent past, the AMS was the most respected student government in Canada. It was the envy of other universities because the AMS provided a solid base from which students' interests were represented in the university, and indeed within the province. The presidency of the AMS was a cherished, and much sought-after position usually occupied by a leading student intellectual. A position on Outer Council was an honour not to be taken lightly. In general, both the administration and the student body held the AMS in high regard.

But we have slipped far away from that state, until today we find a decaying AMS which commands little respect from the university administration, and almost none from the student body. Clearly the AMS should be allowed to die, and failing that, the proper authorities should put the AMS out of its misery. After a brief eulogy, we should start anew.

The causes of the death of the AMS are many. The creation of student senators has removed the Senate from AMS influence; the lack of strong leadership, for there hasn't been a good executive team in at least four years; and the inability of the AMS to see beyond its own walls have contributed to the current problem. The vitality of the AMS to discuss and act on problems of general concern to students has been lost. AMS politicians are unable to pull themselves above the fray of internal political battles. The only purpose for AMS existence is to ensure its own continuance. There is no dynamism and no sense of purpose of direction.

The purpose of any political organization, and especially the AMS should be to help those who are in need. It was a cry in the sixties for a new lifestyle that led the AMS to build Elrond. The AMS has become more interested in Pub profits than in building Elronds. The AMS has the rare opportunity to offer positive criticism to the university on issues ranging from tenure to steady state enrolment and to take action on these issues.

The AMS has the opportunity to comment and act on municipal matters in such areas as housing standards and police services. Most importantly, the AMS can discuss problems of national and international concern and make the appropriate governments aware of our concerns. It was the founding purpose of the AMS to provide a forum for the discussion of such matters.

Along the road of history, the AMS has lost its sense of purpose and direction, and without a radical reformation will probably never again find its goals as a student organization. But the AMS is there, if we the students are willing to again commit ourselves to its purpose. We need strong leadership and a new philosophy, one which affirms that the AMS is more than services and internal politics. We need a philosophy which recognizes as important caring for the needs of students and of non-students in the university and in the national community.

case

It is unusual for the Journal to make an early endorsement of election candidates, but the exemplary virtues of this dynamic trio requires immediate recognition. For the Associatelessts: William Hardely, Victor L. Brollie, and John L. Bottomdollar.

Bus-it: AMS to fight Watts

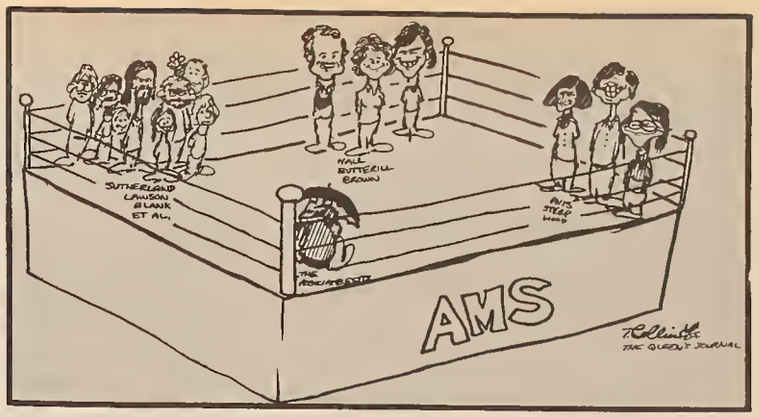
AMS President Ian Nordheimer has said that he and Vice-President Paul Steep will protest the Principal's decision to restrict the university's contribution to Bus-it to $3 per student.

If the university pays only $3 per student, students may have to pay $2 more for Bus-it next year, bringing each student's contribution to $6.50, said Nordheimer. In the past, the university has paid 40 percent of the cost of Bus-it, but is unwilling to pay that much this year, he said.

On Thursday, Nordheimer told Outer Council that Principal Ronald Watts' decision was "unfair and unacceptable."

Nordheimer said that it is possible that next month's referendum on Bus-it may contain a two part question. Part One would say "Are you willing to raise your portion of the Bus-it cost from $4.50 to $6.50?, and Part Two: "Are you willing to pay $5.70 given that the university pays the remaining 40 percent of the cost?"

Nordheimer said that the university has a responsibility towards students living at West Campus, and warned that if 40 percent of the cost was not paid by the university the alienation of West Campus from the main campus would be aggravated.



If students vote for part Two of the referendum, the AMS will be able to go to the Principal with the students' demands reinforcing the AMS request for a 40 percent contribution from the university. If the university refuses to contribute this much, there would be no Bus-it scheme next year.

The Kingston Public Utilities Commission (PUC), owners of Kingston Transit, raised ticket prices from 20 cents to 25 cents this summer. This 25 percent increase accounts for the rise in the price of Bus-it for which the PUC is asking.

Watts on OFS rally

Principal Ronald Watts has called student attendance at tomorrow's rally in Toronto a "personal option." He advised that students speak with their instructors before missing classes to participate in the rally to protest the McKeough-Henderson report.

Watts said he was "of two minds" about whether the rally "will necessarily be the best way of changing the government's mind" on the issue of funding of post-secondary education. He said also that he was concerned about the McKeough-Henderson report because it aims at minimizing costs to government and shifting the financial load to students. Watts pointed out that by increasing tuition fees and decreasing the government proportion, there would be no additional revenue coming to the universities. The measure would simply save the government money but the university would gain no benefit at all by a tuition fee increase.

Interviews with the candidates

Hall, Brown Butterill

Bob Reynolds

All three candidates were available at the pre-arranged time, however, the interviewers were unable to attend. Due to the last minute change of plans, Ross Brown, candidate for Vice President (University Affairs) did not attend the interview through no fault of his own.

The chief priority of the Hall, Butterill, Brown team is for Queen's to be "an academic, educational institution", as these qualities are the "heart, soul and substance of the university." The way that this team plans to sustain the high academic standards at Queen's is, according to Cindi Hall, "to change the priorities in the way they are distributed."

In reference to the library, Hall stated that, "library facilities have been sadly neglected;" the reason, according to Bob Butterill is because "the library has not received sufficient funds."

When asked if the universities should receive increased funding, Hall replied, "yes, universities should be given more operating grants, but is it feasible for society? No." As Bob Butterill said, "we want input".

On the question of communication with students Hall stated that she "would make an exerted effort to be accessible," but also pointed out that former AMS President John Gray "tried to be overly accessible."

Regarding student services, Hall said "There is no need for any service to run at a loss." Commerce student Butterill, when asked about his response to the losses incurred by the typing service noted that the service should be the recipient of "cost-benefit analysis." In reference to the photocopying service, Butterill noted that "inventory cost was difficult." When asked if his team would make services adhere closely to their budgets, Butterill replied, "There must be flexibility, but there must be strength also."

Avis, Steep Wood

Sarah Yarnell

Jamie Avis, Paul Steep and Kathy Wood are concerned with the "total environment" at Queen's, and their election platform stresses both the quality of education and the "more immediate" aspects of the AMS administration such as offering "specific help" to McArthur students who feel alienated from the main campus.

Wood, running for Vice-President (University Affairs) emphasized that the team placed "high priority" on the quality of education at Queen's.

Avis, running for President, pointed out that their "all around approach" to student government meant they would strive for more exciting concerts, better pubs and other improved services which they feel are important to students. Steep, aiming for the mandate to continue as Vice-President (Operations) said that the "smaller, more immediate" services of the AMS were important in the every day life of a student.

Steep vowed to "end our reliance on the Ontario Federation of Students to do our research for us" and Wood stressed that it is "just about time we started sending things from the bottom up to OFS." She supported the newly formed standing AMS committee on OFS policy, and said that Queen's must provide more

The Socialist Slate

The Journal and the socialist collective could not agree on a format for interviews, and so the following platform prepared by the socialists is printed here instead of an interview. The Journal wanted to interview the three individuals running for the executive, but the group refused this request, saying that they would only consent to an interview with the entire collective.

The word "socialism" implies a process. "Socialists" methodically analyse the mechanisms by which our society operates, and use this analysis to provide rational direction for society to follow. This method of working from theory to practice produces an integrated and unified plan of action rather than specific stopgap actions to meet specific crises.

Today we are in the midst of an economic crisis which has become a dominant factor affecting society. Stemming from the capitalist system under which we live, this condition is affecting numerous groups, especially the working class. Taking the form of wage controls, cutbacks in secondary education, hospitals and other social services, working people are being forced to bear the brunt of the crisis. In a similar manner universities are being attacked and rationalized to reduce government

Believe it or not there are still a number of agencies in Kingston in need of volunteers. We'd like to imagine-hope that there are a number of Queen's students who have spare time and would like to volunteer! Does that sound like you? Sure it does. All you require is an hour or two a week and some committment. How about it? We need volunteers in prisons, Day Care Centres and hospitals. Collin's Bay Penitentiary needs two volunteers - one to teach English to an Italian speaking inmate and one to help an inmate with his level 4, four-part harmony music. Also, three volunteers are needed to work with some girls in a group home, on a one-to-one basis, or as a group. Interested? Come in and to our office, 2nd floor of the Grey House (12:30 to 4:30). Sign up and be a volunteer!

Arts audits most common

Karen Beckstead

The practice of auditing courses at Queen's appears to be most popular in the humanities and social sciences, according to Harry Sterne, Queen's Assistant Registrar. Auditing a course consists of attending the classes of a course. The auditor is not allowed to write exams or essays. Courses in the sciences involving laboratory work are not suitable to be audited.

Though it is no longer necessary to apply to audit, if one does register there is a $25 fee. This is to prohibit the participation of those students who are not strongly interested, and to help defray some of the indirect costs related to class size. It is possible for a student to receive permission from a professor to audit a course and then not formally register, thus avoiding the $25 fee. According to Sterne this is so, yet he does not feel that it is a problem significant enough to warrant procedures necessary to prohibit it.

Nothing prevents an individual from auditing a course one year and then taking it for credit another. However, Sterne doubts that many follow this practice. It is unlikely that a student who had the original intent of auditing a course would later decide to enroll for credit.

Sterne views the auditing system as a "service to the community." "Most students are older men and women, many are retired and not necessarily interested in obtaining a degree." fn 1973-1974, 91 students registered as auditors, including a summer school enrolment of 32. This year 42 people have registered for a straight audit programme. There are no figures available stating the number of students who are working on a degree and simultaneously auditing one or two courses. According to George Wallace of the Queen's Records Department it would be a very complicated procedure to determine this statistic. It does appear, however, to be a wide-spread practice.

Individual professors determine whether or not course enrolment will permit auditors; there are no departmental regulations. There are also no requirements for those who audit.

OSAP loan to increase

(CUP) Ontario students will have to borrow more money next year under the Canada Student Loans Plan before receiving any provincial grants, informed sources revealed in Toronto on January 13.

The increase in the mandatory loan ceiling - from $800 this year to $1000 by next year - will not be publicly announced "for some time" the source said.

The government would neither confirm nor deny a possible increase and will only say that some changes in the loan plan will be announced "within several weeks."

Suggestions for top-dogs

Susan Paju

Last Tuesday an open meeting was held in the McLaughlin Room of the Students' Union to formulate policy questions to be sent to the Progressive Conservative leadership candidates.

Lawrence Bell, a political science student at Queen's, and chairman of the meeting, declared that the purpose for the questions was to "elicit personal responses from the candidates...in an attempt to see past the personalities the candidates have presented to us in newsletters and press reports."

Stimulating discussion eventually produced seven multi-faceted questions covering all major issues in the upcoming convention: labor-management relations, northern development, biculturalism, urban problems, law and order, foreign affairs and party policy Of particular interest to Queen's students are riders to the questions inquiring about the candidates' opinions on: wage and price controls; transportation problems in urban centres;legislation regarding soft drugs; social justics (for example, capital punishment and abortion); foreign ownership; and the role of youth in the Progressive Conservative party.

The questions will be carried to the PC convention to be held in Ottawa in the third week of February by Queen's delegates Doug Bonnell, Rob Welch, Gloria Thompson and Kim Ainslie.

Watts cuts Queen's watts

Betty Boland

Last Thursday, Principal Watts launched Queen's energy conservation programme with the symbolic pressing of a button in the Central Heating Plant.

The campaign is designed to gain the cooperation of all students and staff to keep energy costs to a minimum. This will leave more money for costs directly related to academics.

Stickers reading "Turn off for Queen's" have been placed near most light switches.

Pamphlets are being distributed which outline energy costs and consumption for the university, and the campaign's goals. They also contain a check list of ways to cut down energy consumption. Other suggestions as to how energy can be saved may be sent to Mr. G. R. McCahill, Director, Development of Physical Plant.

In 1972, Queen's used 51.5 kilowatt hours of energy for every square foot of floor space. This was reduced to 45.4 units by 1975. The target is to reduce consumption to 40 units by 1977.

Political practices

A little extra cash

Rob Reynolds

A relatively straight forward budget motion met with heavy discussion at Thursday's Outer Council meeting, with the last minute addition of an extra $250 to prepare for Wednesday's OFS mass meeting in Toronto. fn discussing the motion, it was Bernie Koch, Director of the Queen's Student Agency, who raised the real controversy, when he questioned Peter Lane's quote on the cost of the buses for the mass meeting. Lane quoted a figure of "about $600" when referring to the cost of the two buses to transport Queen's students to and from the Toronto meeting.

Koch contended that the University Travel Club could transport the same number of students as Wagar Coach Lines for approximately $450. When asked by other Outer Council members why he wasn't using the UTC service Lane replied that he hadn't asked for a quote from them. Lane was quick to add that if the AUTC offered an acceptable plan at a lower cost he would consider using their service.

Lane and fan Nordheimer pointed out that the additional $250 was needed for other reasons besides transportation and if there was money left over it would be returned to the AMS coffers Finally the motion to adopt the budget was passed.

One of the other reasons for the additional funding is to publicize the January 20 Forum Discussion or the McKeough Report. The discussion will commence at 4:00 in Ellis Hall

How about another film for the frosh

Rob Reynolds

Outer Council voted Thursday night to recommend that $1,000 be granted to Quarry Films "for the purpose of producing a Queen's student film." This film, according to Mike MacMillan, "would serve to promote Queen's to prospective students." The film which would replace the present promotional film, "Queen's '71", should be ready by the end of August according to MacMillan.

In listing the reasons for replacing "Queen's '71", MacMillan stated that, "times have changed and issues have changed." MacMillan asserted that one of the themes for "Queen's '71" was, "to explain why student radicalism passed this place by." One of the questions which the new film would address itself to is, "What is the role of the University today."

MacMillan also pointed out that the film presently planned would cost far less than the previous film. "Queen's '71" cost over $10,000 to produce, according to MacMillan, and the new film would cost $3,500. The 1969 production cost more because it employed professional photographers and had to rent much of the equipment as Quarry Films was just beginning operation. The 1976 production will be done with existing equipment and student photographers.

Quarry Films has already been assured of funds by the Alumni Association and is currently applying to the Vice-Principal's office and the Kingston Businessmans' Association to meet the $3,500 cost.

Common law to receive equal priority

Rob Reynolds

The AMS Outer Council passed a motion Thursday night to, "recommend to the residence board that Common-law couples be given equal priority to married couples." Speaking in support of his motion, Ian Nordheimer noted that while apartments exist for married couples - at West Campus - common-law couples were not accorded an equal priority with the Residence Board when applying for this accommodation. Nordheimer stated that one of the major considerations of the motions was, "to equalize the housing situation on the Queen's campus."

Nordheimer also pointed out that in the event of a Queen's student living common-law with a non-Queen's student, they should be given equal priority with married students.

A sign of the times; another campus organization: "Queen's forever dark."

CAREER OPPORTUNITIES SASKATCHEWAN
DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE
Policy Analysis and Program Evaluation

The Budget Bureau (Treasury Board Secretariat) of the Province of Saskatchewan is interested in interviewing graduates in all disciplines seeking a dynamic career in Public Administration to fill a wide range of program evaluation positions.

THE POSITIONS:

The Program Evaluation Analyst is involved in the review of public expenditure programs on behalf of the Treasury Board - the financial and management committee of the Cabinet.

The work focuses on the evaluation of new and existing programs which are proposed and undertaken by a wide variety of government departments and agencies. The evaluation considers the current policy thrusts of the Government, the social, economic and political aspects of programs, and the relative merits of programming in the context of competing claims on resources.

These positions will be of interest to those interested in questions of public policy and the solution of problems facing government.

SALARY:

$12,000 - $30,000 - depending upon qualifications and experience.

THE APPLICANTS:

Applications are invited from graduates (Baccalaureate - honours, Masters or Doctoral) from all disciplines although some preference will be given to those graduating in Commerce, Business Administration, Public Administration and Economics. "Preference" should not deter TOP graduates from other disciplines from applying. Applicants possessing only an undergraduate degree must be in the top quartile of their class.

Please forward applications or resumes as quickly as possible to:

Mr. D.M. Wallace,
Director, The Budget Bureau,
Department of Finance,
Legislative Building,
Regina, Saskatchewan,

Campus comment

interviewed by Fredericka Birke and photos by Milo

A 65 percent increase in tuition and a reduction of the grant portion of student aid in favor of an increased loan program are the two issues on which the McKeough Report will be criticized by the OFS at their rally on Wednesday, January 21. In light of the fact that the AMS is providing free transportation to Toronto for all those interested in attending this rally, the Journal questioned Queen's students whether they supported the OFS rally and whether they planned to attend. Though generally agreeing with principles behind the OFS protest, most interviewed admitted that they would not attend the rally itself to show their support.

I don't think it wise to accept the ruling of the Davis government", stated Patrick Drotos (English '77). "It's rather like sheep going to slaughter." Patrick, however, conveyed mixed feelings about the OFS rally and questioned its overall effectiveness. "I'm uncertain to how effective it will be in either bringing pressure against the Davis government, or in cultivating a favorable reaction from society. From the '60's we have learned that the rally is rather a blunt and limited instrument." Patrick suggested "perhaps an alternative for having a rally at Queen's Park would be actually rallying the students; wielding them as a political rally within themselves." If everyone wrote a fiery letter of protest to Davis and made their feelings heard, headway would undoubtedly be made, was Patrick's implication. When regarding the overall attitude at Queen's, Patrick commented, "I regret the lack of political awareness at Queen's which I feel is related to both a lack of information and to the fact that students are perhaps not really relating to their leaders."

Michelle Meyer (Geography '79) felt, "If the rally is carried through, organized, and kept under control properly, it will be successful not only in showing the government that students are concerned, but in showing society as well." Criticism was launched at the poor publicity on the OFS rally, which Michelle felt only helped to intensify the generally apathetic attitude of Queen's students. With regard to AMS providing free transportation to Toronto, Michelle remarked, "One bus, as far as I'm concerned, is merely a 'polite' gesture on the part of the AMS, and gives no incentive whatsoever for accumulating large numbers of participants in this protest." When asked if providing more buses would really make the difference in encouraging a larger turn-out, Michelle admitted that the number of participants would not likely increase. "Those that will go to the rally are the few who are genuinely interested. Most are not, and are turned-off with this idea altogether."

"I'm not interested in attending the OFS rally," was John McLaughlin's (Life Science '77) reply. "In general, I don't respect rallies as a form of protest." Though John admitted he knew nothing about the OFS or how effectively they represent university concerns, he expressed the hope that the OFS would 'civilly' let the government know just what these concerns are. "With respect to the cause behind the protest," John stated, "I don't at all mind if tuition fees rise. I realize we all need an education, but Ontario can't afford to lower its standards just to make ends meet." John strongly felt cutbacks on graduate programs, as well as the problem of limited enrolment, are causes for concern. "As long as Queen's is able to continue its high standards, and is giving us a fine education, we should not complain too loudly over an increase."

"Rallies have by now lost much of their impact on the government; therefore I doubt if the OFS rally will do much, if any, good." was the reply of Michael Craig (Urban Planning; Special Status Student). In the meantime, Michael feels that all that the OFS and students can do is to outline their concerns, because the government does decide to raise tuition fees by 65 percent, everyone should protest by attending classes, but refusing to pay." Michael had faith that most professors at Queen's would support this form of student protest, and would continue giving lectures as planned. Having just returned from Berkeley University in California, Michael drew interesting parallels from his observations. "Out in the West Coast, everyone seems to be into something at least, whereas Eastern Canada appears to be in some sort of cultural lag. The general 'apolitical' attitude at Queen's is a reflection of this." A successful outcome of the upcoming OFS rally would thus appear to be quite doubtful.

A hysterical Joyce Roe accepts the Associatelessts' nomination form; a turning point in one of the most interesting campaigns since the Chinese Revolution.

"We are all running for president because that will tend to even out our workload." explained John L. Bottomdollar. "We also want to do the university a valuable service, but we're not sure what." Bottomdollar is the tallest of the team which is running for president. He is well known for holding world records in mudslinging and libel, and he likes his mum and never hurts small animals. He was once AMS reporter for the Journal.

"As one of the most brilliant and talented minds of this millenium, I have deigned to run for the AMS presidency," drawled Victor L. Brollie. Mr. Brollie is a virtuoso cellist, is currently directing his own play in London's West Side, and is widely considered in diplomatic circles to be the most powerful man on earth. When asked for his reasons for running, Mr. Brollie chuckled, "I could use a good laugh."

"I believe my lack of experience as President of the Queen's Celibacy Council eminently qualifies me to an executive position on the AMS," commented tall, handsome William G. Hardeley. "Besides, I own an Irish setter named Caramel and was once AMS reporter for the Journal. "The fact that my dad needs a job is not a factor in my decision to run for public office," were Hardeley's words to our reporter.

How's your housing

The Queen's Journal is investigating student housing conditions. We would like to hear from students living in rented accommodation which they feel is of inferior quality. Tell us about fire hazards; number of fire exits; weaknesses in the floors and stairs; dampness or flooding; insufficient washrooms; faulty plumbing; over-heating or under-heating; poor door locks; windows ineffectual in keeping out thieves and vandals; infestation by cockroaches and other creepy crawlies; noise from plumbing and neighbours; lack of cleanliness of shared property (ie: apartment halls and exterior); peeling paint and wallpaper; stained ceilings; cracked and chipped linoleum; floorboards or tiles; and other poor conditions you have to endure. Our impression of student housing is one of poor conditions. However if some students are enjoying good conditions we want to hear about them as well.

Please include your name, the number of occupants including yourself who share your dwelling, the name, phone number and address of your landlord, the amount of rent you pay monthly, whether or not you have a lease, your address and your phone number. Address to Sarah Yarnell, Queen's Journal, Student's Union. We will visit several places to collect detailed information and to take photographs for the paper. We would like to have the investigation completed by mid-February, so please send in submissions right away in order to leave time for us to examine the accommodation.

Thank you very much.

Annual Queen's Frolic

Terry Collins

From 1922 to 1935, the Grand Opera House on Princess Street was home to an annual Queen's production known as the Frolic. Ten 'sure fire acts', vaudvillian in nature, comprised the first revue in '22. Assisted by the Queen's Drama Guild and conducted by the various faculties, the shits included "Dapper Dan" performed by Arts and "Bluebeard" starring members of the Levana Society. The first show was, as you may have expected, "an unparallelled hit".

Unfortunately, there was a blemish on the evening created by the rowdiness of the student audience which tossed "obnoxious missiles" at the performers.

1923, 1924 and 1925 saw Frolics of much the same nature as the first one. Levana chorus lines, comedians, a couple of professional acts and one-act plays filled the bill. After the show, it became customary to hold a party for the performers and audience (in 1924 the party was held in Ontario Hall, Gents - 50c, Ladies - 25c.)

As the Frolic developed over the years, the party afterwards became the more important of the two events. The Journal launched an attack on the show in the late '20's. By comparison with the McGill "Red and White Review", the Queen's effort lacked lustre. A questionnaire was administered in the Journal concerning goals, material, criticism and so on. Subsequently, faculty acts were abandoned, and auditions were introduced.

Half of the 1926 Frolic was taken up with a comedy called "Chinese Paradise" which dealt with life at Queen's. The Journal called the show "the successor of a line of slovenly constructed, inadequately rehearsed, poorly acted" shaws. However, it was so popular that the actors had to do a second performance.

In 1928 the Senate complained that the Frolic was disrupting classes, and was giving poor students an excuse not to work; they disapproved of the rowdyism at the theatre. The Journal agreed that there was "lots of room for improvement". That year the Frolic headlined a production which centered around a Queen's student who was forever in trouble for stealing exam papers and medications. The show was set in the Registrar's office, the Library and the AMS Court. Following the show a party was held, quite contrary to an agreement between the Senate and the AMS. This was one of the key events which led up to the student strike of 1928, discussed in a previous column.

From 1930 to 1935 the show improved with the help of the Queen's Drama Guild. Journal headlines in 1935 read, "Lorne Greene Outstanding" - he was a singer. Robertson Davies played the villian.

From 1940 to the 1960's, performances included "Ham on Rye" (billed as a "hippy, hep, happy" musical in 1947). 'Pay the Piper' and 'Daddy-O' were presented. Some were successes, others were unqualified flops. In later years the shows were produced by the Queen's Review Guild.

Today the student show known as Sobriety is produced, written and executed solely by the Arts and Commerce freshmen. "Inebriety" is the Engineering counterpart, likewise produced during Frosh Week. The Meds students annually come up with a theatrical revue such as 'Great Expectorations" or this year's 'Thanks For the Manimarries". Typically the show is sold out.

XXX

After the publication of last week's column on the 1956 recapturing of the USA by Queen's, the Journal received a call from one of the initiators of the prank, (Souvenirs, QJ, Jan 13). Apparently the 'Royal Society of Undergraduate Engineers' were conducting a meeting at the Tap Room when the idea struck them. The original plan was to reclaim the States during the American Thanksgiving Weekend. However, for lack of funds, they decided to wait until George Washington's Birthday.

The gentleman who called, he didn't leave his name, said that the FBI was not involved in the incident, however the Mayor of Watertown sent a bill to Queen's for approximately $40. That was the amount required to hire a steeplejack to remove the British Flags. Upon receiving the bill, the Engineers went to the Bank of Commerce, got enough pounds, shillings and pence to cover the invoice, went back to Watertown and presented the money after making a terribly long and involved speech (In a British accent, of course).

Source material for this column was taken from the files of the Alumni Association. Our sincere thanks are extended to Mr. Murray Gill and Mr. Herb Hamilton for their generous assistance during the production of this column.

Five musicians warm up for an early Frolic. And to think that Med's Variety night had such noble beginnings.

Creighton at Dunning Trust lecture

We are 'unhappy helpless insignificancies'

Tim Greenwood

The Welfare State is turning us into "unhappy, helpless insignificancies," declared Donald Creighton in the opening speech to the Dunning Trust Lectures.

The eminent Canadian historian spoke last Wednesday night on the Individual and the Welfare State. Dunning Auditorium was packed; people filled the aisles as well as the seats, listening intently to the entertaining and enlightening lecture that was given.

Peacetime saw the growth of a booming economy as well as the growth of the welfare state, he said. At first the individual was the chief beneficiary, freed from old fears and "the common drudgery of the past" Creighton said. Canadians shrugged off pre-war morality; there were unapologetic couples living together, casual dress and undress...and human depravity seemed to grow without end," observed Creighton.

Civil servants "increased to batallions and then to armies" Creighton remarked, and in the blacker months they could always "pop down to resorts." Tourism became the great industry of the Welfare State particularly with "the happy and foot-loose wandering" of young Canadians.

Peoples' belief in the Welfare State grew into unease as the "sixties declined into the seventies" and doubts arose about the merits of uncontrolled growth, Creighton related. The period of the growth of the individual was soon overshadowed by the growths of organizations.

"Two species of leviath" grew: the industrial corporations and the Welfare State, said Creighton. Feeling secure, the huge corporations ceased to compete for the benefit of the individual.

Enormous costs didn't deter builders; progress was seen in terms of money spent. More money could simply be doled out and taxes increased. The Welfare State took on the character of a "three-sided struggle for the tax money," Creighton stated. People were now seen not as individuals but as taxpayers, consumers or just purchasers.

In the new social order that emerged, the principles of "justified success and deserved failure" seemed to vanish, and the work ethic was jeered at to cheers on campuses, Creighton commented.

Compassion became fashionable among politicians, and with each new pocket of misery" that was discovered" there would be a warm, compassionate blush of tears," observed Creighton.

As Canada slipped into the seventies people began to fear two things.

First they were uncertain whether the government could control the economy. Measures that had been successful just after the war were tried again by Trudeau in 1969, with almost calamitous results. His party almost lost the election in 1972, said Creighton.

Canadians were also anxious about the future of the social security program. It was designed as an insurance policy to protect responsible citizens, "not as a handout," remarked Creighton.

People began to lose faith in the system; some chose to withdraw to a simpler life while the majority remained and tried to "endure, survive, or master" the system.

He noted that our belief in growth was no longer as unqualified as before. The possibility of the population becoming more stable has increased with the institution of the tough immigration law of 1967 and the drop in the birth rate almost to the level of replacement.

In the past, profit-motivated companies had exploited Canada's natural resources to satisfy "the voracious desires of the United States" commented Creighton. But with the new awareness acquired during the energy crisis of 1974, the loss of human and natural resources seems to be on the decline. The set of values Trudeau has asked us to adopt are not new, remarked Creighton "but simply the old set," a return to the virtues of restraint and moderation.

Finally Creighton suggested that we as Canadians must make up our minds to face "a quieter and slower future."

detailed input to the provincial student organization.

Avis said he was willing to contribute directly to the OFS: "I would like to join the OFS executive," he said. Avis, Steep and Wood agreed that Queen's membership on the OFS executive was the best way to offer to OFS direction which was approved of and backed by Queen's students.

Wood wants to give students "solid support" when they have to do things such as go before a rent review board. She plans to be "outgoing enough to encourage students to come to us" with matters that concern them.

All three candidates stressed that their past experience has enabled them to define the problems of the AMS. Avis, who is currently a law rep on Outer Council and Education Commissioner, said that the team has solutions for many of the AMS' difficulties. Steep, Vice-President (Operations) since mid-November, stressed that due to their background, the three could take a "strong stand on issues which are important to students." Avis said that Steep "has a head start" on the job of Vice-President (Operations).

Avis said he, Steep and Wood were not only involved in the AMS but participated in sports and other student activities. He pointed out that it was important for candidates to be familiar with more than just the walls of the AMS office Avis said he was involved in intramural athletics; Wood plays for the Queen's hockey Gals.

Socialists

spendings and thereby help prop up a failing economy. We can see this in the recent cutback threats to the universities, coupled with higher tuitions and more restrictive financial support.

In contemporary society a major role of the university is to produce technicians, engineers, managers and other skilled workers who are used by the corporations to continue to make profits. The university is also used by the corporations to educate and perpetuate a new ruling class composed of their daughters and sons. Finally it exists to instil and reinforce the dominant ideas of society, such as competition, sexism, racism and political apathy. It is for these reasons that the university is being used as an important support institution for the economic-political system.

In the face of the immediate financial troubles, however, fewer skilled workers are needed in the economy and, thus, the university is being rationalised at the expense of students and education.

We, the students, as a body in society, must start to realize some of the realities in the existing situation. It is hopeless to suggest that students within the university can act independently of society. The system must change before we can seriously speak of changing the university. Obviously, we cannot change society alone and so we must begin to unite with other forces that can. Consequently, we believe it is only the implementation of such a perspective that will allow us to seriously deal with not only academic standards but also social change. More specifically, we would suggest a number of concrete points:

(1) Since we cannot effect this change ourselves, we must recognize the similarity between what is happening in universities, high schools, libraries, post offices, and factories. Students and other people in society are facing the same attacks and it is important that we begin to express solidarity and support for their struggles against the cutbacks and wage controls. We should also support the unionisation of graduate students, teaching assistants, campus support staff and other workers who are fighting a defensive against inflation and recession.

(2) We vigorously oppose the educational cutbacks and the further injustices it is introducing into universities. Instead of the rich at university we believe that all education should be based on merit not class. Therefore, we would support free tuition, living stipends, and an educational system providing equal opportunities for all.

(3) We call for a campaign to help students and working people in Kingston fight against the actions of the system. For example, food co-ops, especially on campus, are necessary to combat a food industry based on profits, not nutrition, plenty and cheapness. Similarly, more housing co-ops and tenants associations are required to break monopolies and curb the high prices of Kingston landlords.

(4) We feel it is also important to support the struggles of prisoners, gays, Native People and women, who are particularly oppressed by the present system. Women for example, are currently paid less than men, lack unions, are streamed toward dead-end jobs in the education process, and must daily face the sexism of society. For these reasons, we would support campus daycare, women's studies, free abortion and contraception on demand, and groups which are attempting to change this situation.

(5) Although only stop-gap measures, we call for a stronger student voice within the educational process and the university. Students should have much more control over the daily operations of Queen's and its overall function in society. Consequently we would support a stronger OFS, NUS, increased student participation in class room conditions, hiring and firing of professors, more effective evaluations of courses and support to organizations like OPIRG.

It is on these issues, which we believe are central, that the Socialist Slate stands and urges you to consider as necessary

Full time president is unnecessary

Giles Gherson

Last Thursday night Outer Council members rejected the motion that they accept the report by the Committee on Restructuring.

The report, a mere two and a half pages, was considered too brief by Outer Council members, Bob Atkinson, President of ASUS referred to it as "incomplete".

The Committee on Restructuring was formed last October at the behest of John Gray, ex-AMS President, who found difficulties fulfilling simultaneously the roles of full time student and President of AMS. In an editorial (Oct. 16) the Journal applauded the decision to strike an Executive Committee on the grounds that "extensive research, great amounts of student input, and the study of similar situations in student governments across the country" would provide a much-needed re-evaluation of the AMS executive.

The terms of reference given the committee were to "investigate the structure of the AMS Executive and make recommendations in time to be implemented for the 1976-77 elections." Complaining that such terms were "vague", the Committee nevertheless summarily concludes that "the existing constitutional structure governing the positions of the executive remain in its present structure" and moreover that "Queen's does not need a full time president...that the president of the Alma Mater Society must necessarily by the very nature of his job, be a student". The recommendations arise out of the judgment that "the current system is flexible enough to allow an individual(s) enough freedom of movement to get the job done" and given a willingness to delegate responsibility on the part of an AMS executive, their duties while "not light" should neither be "too demanding on an individual so that he has no time for anything else" - namely academics. The committee also found wanting the assumption that expansion within the AMS has resulted in the president's job becoming too time consuming, on the grounds that this expansion had been in the area of Services - "the responsibility of the Vice-President of Operations and the full time Business Administrator.

A minority report was presented by Doug Bonnell presenting the case for "a full time President option", an alternative, it claims, the committee "deemed to ignore."

"Why are so many of us being killed in car accidents?"

It's a fact. Last year the 16 to 24 age group accounted for more than one-third of all drivers killed on Ontario roads.

And nearly 40% of all drivers involved in fatal accidents were our age.

Maybe we can't change the world but we can change this.

We've got to slow down.

We've got to live.

Think about it.

Profile

The Student Volunteer Bureau (SVB) is a service at Queen's which acts as a liaison between different individuals and organizations in Kingston requiring volunteers, and those students who are willing to dedicate some of their time towards a useful community activity. The Bureau receives requests for volunteers from approximately 45 agencies in the Kingston area.

Pam Tate, office coordinator of this organization, and its only paid member, works for an executive consisting of ten members: a director, an assistant director in charge of public relations, another assistant director in charge of special projects and eight members directly responsible for volunteer positions related to youth, health, prisons, and the elderly.

Along with SVB activities, Pam, a fourth year Sociology major, is currently involved with the Birth control Centre, and has previously been involved with such student services as TAK, Camp Outlook, the Birth Control Centre, and has had past experience with SVB through being in charge of the prison section, along with various other committments. Needless to say, her involvement in all of these areas helps to tie a lot together, and gives her confidence in her ability to deal with people, and to aid them by providing them with the information necessary in opening channels for direct involvement.

Generally, people have tended to express an interest in dealing with areas related to youth or health, but students interested in other areas have volunteered their time as well. The amount of time one has to put into this form of dedication depends largely on the organization chosen. However, an estimate of two hours per week is considered a fair one, with time spent in activities such as visiting hospitals or the elderly, or in becoming a Big Brother or Big Sister, being a very flexible and personal matter. Anyone interested in becoming involved is urged to visit the SVB Office situated on the second floor of the grey house anytime between 12:30 and 4:30 p.m.

Although plans for the initiation of a coordinator in charge of all Student Services are in the air, for next year, the basic function of the Student Volunteer Bureau as a liaison between student volunteers and the community at large will definitely remain unchanged.

FUTURISTS

Their wave still baunts
the shores it came to grief upon.
Now autumn flaunts
their future's yellow blouse.
Blown black, the leaves become like rain the rain like leaves--my bouse, a rustle overhead. I dwell in forests turned to wine, forgetfulness tbe stumps of trees like brown and rotting teeth, the grinning of the [illegible]
the fruit mysterious of doubt.
Their lions yawn on lawns now gone to [illegible]
tbeir prophets let the fires die out.
Perbaps they will not come.
Fruit overripe blears on tbe bough.

a nature's war

sent to spy,
propelled to fly,
runs mother nature's doom shipping cold, leaving moulds,

alongside crowded avenues

but heat–
more dominant power, breathing over desolate tower, sbows this world it's waking bour
by burning, bleeding,
weeping,
louder...

LIFE CYCLE

Is this the dawn?
Do I see, perchance,
In the birth of a new day,
Myself?
Visions, vague memories of the coming.
And love
And innocence

Is tbis the morning?
I ask. Still young and fresb, but already Affected.
The brigbtness, tbe sun, ideals and dreams
of Children in the morning.
And still love
and still innocence.

Is this the afternoon?
I know, for through the morning
I was taught.
The day no longer bright and fresb.
ideals and dreams fade
in the beat of the sun and Memories of days gone before.
And still love.
But innocence departs.

Is tbis the twilight?
I fear now,
of what I have seen
through the day,
and my eyes.
Vesper memories of living,
yet unliving.
So much said.
So little done
Love, life, love
Fade
Bitterness surrounds.

Is this the night?
The darkness I feared
now presses down.
Yet in the void,
Against the black,
Hope. A prelude of another day of another life where Love and Innocence
return.

I await thee, Dawn
I await thee, Life
I wait in hope,
For the sun,
And a second chance,
and a second Coming.

Is tbis the dawn?

Palestine question

Dear Editors:
Your feature of Jan. 8, "The Palestine Question: Zionism and the P.L.O", since it contains several inaccurate statements, conveys a misleading impression both of Zionism and the origins of the Middle East tragedy.

The article, "What is Zionism" refers to Rev. A.C. Forest; a pronounced critic of Israel for a definition of Zionism. The conviction of Zionists that Jews "need a state of their own to secure their identity, to protect themselves from future outbreaks of anti-semitism, and to develop their culture and civilization" arose in a historical context ignored by the article. Zionism was an ideological reaction by Jews in the late 19th and early 20th century to their socio-economic situation. For these Jews to perceive themselves as a separate nation was quite natural: they were segregated geographically, occupationally, and politically from the natural life of the host countries. As was prescribed by law to small scale agriculture and peddling, material wealth was precluded.

The feeling of separateness engendered by these conditions was compounded by the violent hostility of their Christian neighbour: the immediate stimulus behind the Zionist movement were the pogroms, violent attacks on the East-European Jewish communities, after initiated by the government.

Another article presents the U.N. General Assembly's resolution condemning Zionism as a fan of racism. A close examination of the resolution reveals nothing to substantiate this claim. Stripped of its elegant verbiage, the argument appears to be "Because we don't like it" and "because it represents a racial apparatus different from ours, Zionism must therefore be racist." But if no more is offered to support this assertion one must conclude that not only of Zionism, but of all forms of 20th century nationalism, including those of the Third World countries and the Palestinians. For these movements were reactions to precisely the same stimulus as Zionism: they represent the aspirations of distinct national communities seeking self-determination. Indeed the persecution of Jewish minorities in Arab countries demonstrates their ambition.

As for the Palestinians, Shafef Alhout's statement "I was chased out of Israel because I am not a Jew–that is Zionism" alludes to another fallacy in the anti-Zionist argument. The presence of a Jewish state since 1948 has not been the sole impetus behind Palestinian nationalism. Equally responsible were Arab governments who refused to absorb the Palestinians. These governments had specific political motives for putting these refugees in camps. Before oil brought unity and power to the Arab world, most Arab regimes were extremely unstable; hatred of Israel was kept alive largely to divert attention from domestic problems. The refugee camps were the symbols animating the hatred.

As these articles were taken from the Canadian University Press news service, it is not clear whether the views expressed are shared by the Queen's Journal. If so, it is unfortunate. If not, this feature suggests the danger of reprinting unedited hollow arguments.

Dear Editors:
On a topic such as the Middle East, about which few of your readers have much knowledge or first-hand experience, it might be thought the duty of a university newspaper to inform. I was therefore very distressed to read the Canadian University Press article "Zionism and the PLO", which you recently reprinted in the Journal. This article was drawn almost entirely from PLO speeches and propaganda, and made no attempt at a balanced presentation of the issues. Even its definition of Zionism was quoted from the writings of a Canadian churchman whose attacks on Zionism in the editorial pages of the United Church Observer are renowned.

On the other hand, if the article was intended as an expression of your editorial opinion, surely you have a duty to make this clear to your readers, and not to present your biases as facts.

It is the spreading of bigotry in the guise of fact which does so much to harm relations between race and race, religion and religion. Is it too much to expect the members of an institutue of higher learning to consider both sides of a controversial issue fairly and without prejudice?

Drama dept not closed

Dear Editors:
I feel the article in Tuesday's Journal concerning the Art's Festival '76 paints an inaccurate picture of the Drama Department. David Eadie is quoted as saying "We've had good response from all departments, except perhaps the drama department, but that's always seemed to be a rather closed department, a bit isolated from the rest of the campus". It is this attitude of the Drama department as "closed" that I resent. Perhaps its efforts are not successful, but the Drama department has been trying for years to establish its voice in the university community, through productions and public lectures, the majority of which are free.

In this particular instance, it was I who had to get in touch with the Festival Committee. Because of my other obligations I felt unable to take too much responsibility on myself, but I did try to offer as much assistance as possible, and asked to be informed if there were any difficulties in organizing the Drama end of the Festival. I believed "no news was good news" so I pursued the matter no further until I was contacted last week.

I don't know who is at fault for the lack of organization, but I feel Mr. Eadie is unjustified in blaming the Drama department. I know I, and many others, could have done much to be of assistance, if only someone had bothered to inform us of what was happening (or not happening) as the case may be).

Comments on the Comment

Dear Editors:
I would like to clarify my position on the upcoming AMS executive election which was recorded in the 'Campus Comment' of Jan. 16, 1976. I believe that the editing of comments left my statements with a tone which was not found in the original comments. From your version, it would appear that I oppose the "running of solely student affairs" by the AMS Obviously I don't think that a student government should run anyone else's. What I did suggest was that the AMS, in addition to running student affairs, should encourage the consideration of broader social issues, and express the majority student view on national political matters. In their concern with issues which are of crucial social importance (and are not necessarily issues of student politics), the AMS would become more outward-looking. At no point in the discussion did I criticize the Journal itself or refer to "the antics of engineers" as the Journal quotes. Similarly I didn't say anything quite so derogatory as the quoted remark that the AMS never looks beyond their own noses. I think that the choice of words of the edited version unfortunately altered the tone of my remarks. I hope this will clarify matters.

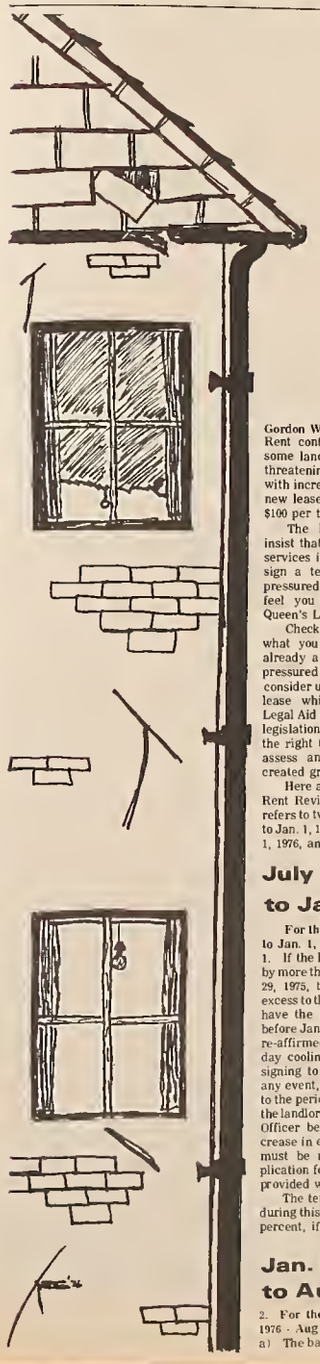
Dear Editors:
In order to clear up my position that I felt was incompletely expressed in Campus Comment, Friday Jan. 16, I would like to state the following:

First of all I said that I felt the university was giving away too many grants and bursaries to foreign grad and undergrad students. I never said that there were too many "imports", but rather, commented that there seemed to be a lot of foreigners here at Queen's. As for their involvement, I agree with what you printed. I did say that they get all the marks, but also added that they work harder than the rest of us, so they deserve it. I made no comment on the job market.



Thanks for allowing me this opportunity for clearing this up.

The Journal appreciates receiving your comments and opinions in the Letters to the Editor, but all letters must meet certain requirements to be printed.

All letters should be clearly written (typed if possible). They must be signed (in blood if possible); if you wish to withhold your name please contact the Editors to explain your reasons. All letters must be less than 250 words in length. We also reserve the right to edit all letters. Letters should be sent to the Queen's Journal Office in the basement of the Students' Union.

Where are you on Rent Review?

Gordon Weir and Nick Bala

Rent control has come into effect. But some landlords are pressuring and even threatening tenants to renew old leases with increases above 8 percent or to sign new leases with added surcharges up to $100 per tenant.

The landlord, for instance, might insist that you sign a contract for labour services in order that you be entitled to sign a tenancy agreement. If you are pressured in any way by your landlord and feel you have been treated unjustly, Queen's Legal Aid can offer advice.

Check the details of the lease; know what you are getting into. If you are already a tenant, do not let yourself be pressured into signing a lease which you consider unjust. Even if you have signed a lease which is unreasonable, Queen's Legal Aid may be able to help you. Recent legislation has provided the tenant with the right to have a Rent Review Officer assess any increase in rent and has created greater security of tenure.

Here are some of the facts on the new Rent Review Legislation. The legislation refers to two time periods: a) July 29, 1975 to Jan. 1, 1976 and b) Jan. 1, 1976 to August 1, 1976, and thereafter.

July 29, 1975 to Jan 1, 1976

For the first time period, July 29, 1975 to Jan. 1, 1976:

1. If the landlord has increased the rent by more than a total of 8 percent since July 29, 1975, then he may either repay the excess to the tenant before Feb. 16, 1976, or have the tenant re-affirm this increase before Jan. 17, 1976. Even if the tenant has re-affirmed the increase, he has a thirty day cooling-off period from the time of signing to revoke this re-affirmation. In any event, the re-affirmation applies only to the period until January 1st, 1976; or c) the landlord may apply to the Rent Review Officer before Jan 31st, 1976 for an increase in excess of 8 percent. The tenant must be notified of the landlord's application for a rent increase and must be provided with reasons.

The tenant may contest any increase during this time period, even if less than 8 percent, if he considers it unreasonable.

Jan. 1, 1976 to Aug. 1, 1976

2. For the second time period, Jan 1st, 1976 - Aug 1st, 1976:

a) The basic maximum increase is still 8 percent above that of July 29th, 1975.

b) If a landlord wishes an increase greater than 8 percent, he must apply to the Rent Review officer for approval before raising the rent. The tenant is not able to agree to this increase before application has been made.

c) If the landlord wishes to increase the rent by 8 percent or less, the tenant may still contest such an increase or he may agree to this increase.

3. If the tenant disputes any amount of the increase, it is the landlord's responsibility to seek justification for the increase, form the Rent Review Officer.

4 Rent attaches to the premises - not to the tenant. Therefore, the increase is in relation to the rent on the rental unit as of July 31, 1975, no matter how many tenants have occupied the premises since then.

5. Services are also considered part of the rent and a reduction of such is considered an increase in rent. Also, an increase in service charges is considered an increase in rent.

Aug. 1, 1976 to Aug. 1 1977

6. For the period from Aug. 1, 1976 - Aug. 1, 1977, the rent control provisions which apply for the period Jan. 1, 1976 - Aug. 1, 1976, will continue to apply with the maximum allowable rent increase to be announced by the government by April 1, 1976.

7. There are provisions for a maximum fine of $2000 for deliberate violation of this act.

Again, it is important that you not be afraid to question the lease and assert your rights. The landlord cannot take retaliatory measures and refuse to renew your lease or tenancy without legally justifiable reasons!

some amendments

Here are some of the facts on the amendments to the Landlord and Tenant Act:

1) The landlord must give the tenant 60 days notice of termination of the lease or tenancy, whether it be a yearly or monthly agreement. However, if you have failed to pay your rent, he need only give 20 days notice, though you can avoid eviction by paying the rent due within 14 days of such notice.

2) The reasons for termination of the tenancy must be provided by the landlord, and must be acceptable to the tenant+ +The issue of the validity of the notice to terminate, and the reasons for it, will be decided when the landlord attempts to get an eviction order in County Court. In other words, they must be just reasons: For example, causing undue damage, permitting an illegal act on the premises, interfering with the tenants, having a number of tenants occupying the residence which contravenes health or safety standards. (But if the tenant who is guilty of the above pays the cost of repairs or ceases the grieved disturbance within seven days, then the termination of notice is null and void).

3) You needn't accept unjust reasons for termination of your tenancy. If the landlord fails to renew your lease, or tenancy, you still enjoy the same legal status as you had under the old agreement. You are now subject to what is called a month to month tenancy. But this doesn't apply if you have entered into a new tenancy agreement prior to the expiration of your old one. Contact us if you have any questions.

4) The reason for termination of tenancy might be that the landlord wishes to repair, renovate, or demolish the premises. In this case, he must give the tenant 120 days notice. Furthermore, when the tenant has received notice of termination he has a right of FIRST REFUSAL which allows him to have first option to return to the premises once repairs, etc. have been completed. But remember, the reasons must be just, and the landlord cannot evict a tenant without a court order.

These are just a few of the facts. If you have any problems or doubts, don't hesitate to call Queen's Legal Aid. We want to hear from you if you have entered into an agreement which you feel might be unjust or unreasonable, or if you are about to enter into an agreement and need advice

Will the real G.B.S. please take a bow

Mann
There are very few plays in this world that, regardless of the quality of the production, still come across as powerful pieces of work. When such plays are done with understanding and empathy, the work comes across in all its glory. Such a play is Dear Liar presently being done by Theatre Five. Written by Jerome Kilty and based on the correspondence between George (Joey) Bernard Shaw and the actress Mrs. Patrick Campbell, the work is an interesting and enlightening view into a side of both famous characters that is seldom, if ever, seen.

Gordon Robertson as G.B. Shaw and Valerie Robertson as Mrs. Campbell have many points in their favour to make their portrayal of the couple a vibrant one. Although this one might seem minor, they are, in one way or another, romantically involved. This personal relationship gave them a rapport necessary to establish convincingly the unusual love relationship between Campbell and Shaw. Second is that unlike the unfair request often made on young actors, the Robertsons have the experience to portray the necessary ages of the characters and the weight of middle age.

The style is simple and in no way detracts from the life on stage, but is just what is needed to accent the action and provide the actors with the required stage props.

Dear Liar is a show that should be seen by all people who have read and read of Shaw or Mrs. Campbell.

For further information or ticket reservation contact Theatre 5 at 546-5460.

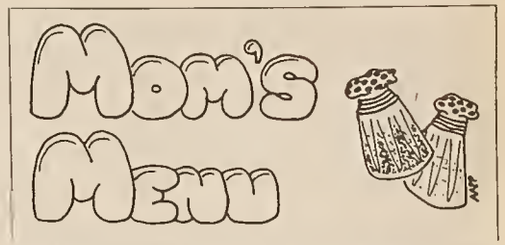
King in heart

not by Sandra Bernstein
If you're tired of typical Hollywood fare, see The King of Hearts. It's different. That is its most striking feature. It was designed to provoke some thought on the part of audience, but thought is not necessary to the enjoyment of the film.

The film is about a Scottish soldier (Alan Bates) in World War 1 who is sent into a town to defuse a bomb. When he gets there he discovers that the inhabitants have fled and the insane asylum has emptied its inmates into the town. They mistake him for their king, and by the time the war returns to the little town, he is not sure which world is the real one.



In a Hollywood film, action is fast from beginning to end and nothing is allowed to interrupt the surface flow. In King of Hearts, many things occur which do not seem to have anything to do with the main action. Things happen without any explanation whatsoever, for instance the brief scene in which Genevieve Bujold crosses to Bates' room by means of a tightrope. This would seem pointless unless one realized that the wire represented the line which Bates is walking between his two worlds. It is a case where the message was considered more important than the spectacle, quite the opposite of Hollywood's practice.

The action is slow, and the film seems to be made up of bits and pieces. They are only related thru message. An entirely different feeling runs thru the movie. It is not a Hollywood movie- slow-moving, and more considered with art than with entertainment, it avoids the flash and cheap thrills. It is not a film designed for the typical movie-mentality. It was a welcome change.

Your Mother
This column's menu is relatively spicy as compared with Friday's stew. The recipe is a nice change for wieners and shows they can be more versatile than just served as hot dogs. This will give you a chance to use some different spices in cooking as well. Spices offer such a wide variety of flavours that it is a good idea to experiment with recipes requiring spices other than those you would normally use. You might find something new that you like.

As a guide, here is a short list of basic spices, besides salt and pepper, which are used in most recipes: garlic powder and salt, onion powder and salt, parsley, chili powder, paprika, worcestershire sauce, and dry mustard.

1 can (14 oz.) tomato sauce
½ cup water
½ cup sliced (or diced) onions
½ cup dried celery
2 tbsp. vinegar

½ tbsp. worceslershire sauce (or 1 tbsp. if you like it hot)
¼ tsp. dry mustard
½ tsp. chili powder
¼ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
1 lb. weiners

In a large frying pan, mix together tomato sauce, water, onions, celery, vinegar, worcestershire sauce, dry mustard, chili powder, salt and papper. Cover and simmer for 20 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add weiners (whole or cut up) and cook about ten minutes.

Cook either spaghetti or rice as directed on package

Serve the Bar-B-Q Style Franks with a cabbage salad.

The immortal Bob Dylan in concert.

Bob Dylan paints his masterpiece

Larry Nightingale

Bob Dylan was the first poet to understand and take advantage of the technology of the 20th Century. Early in the Century, as radio, gramophone records and talking movies became reality, poets continued to write and be published, but the mass audience began turning away from the printed word medium toward the new media. Al Jolson was the people's poet, not Gertrude Stein. Bob Dylan 50 years after live radio was the first poet to successfully take his work into the new electronic world. Dylan knew from the start that to get his work to a mass audience he had to compete with television and pop tunes.

"Unlike most of the songs nowadays that are being written uptown in Tin Pan Alley, that's where most of the folk songs come from nowadays, this wasn't written up there, this was written somewhere in the United States."

The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, 1963.

Not only did Dylan become the people's poet, he also became the poet's poet (read Michael McLure or Allen Ginsberg). Dylan's power and eloquence, at times sensitive, at times sardonic, reached a huge audience. Dylan has sold millions of records.

The medium of recorded sound gave Dylan an immediacy never previously realized in popular art. From 1962 when he first began receiving serious notice, until late 1966, when he was nearly killed on his motorcycle, Dylan wrote hundreds of songs-poems that spoke to, and for, his generation. The first '20th Century poet'.

Bob Dylan's new album, Desire, subtitled Songs of Redemption, is a continuation, and an amplification. It is the urgency and excitement of the early sixties added to Blood on the Tracks. Dylan has come full circle. It's not at all surprising that he should write Hurricane, about Rubin Carter, the boxer in prison for a triple murder Dylan believes he didn't commit. In 1962 Dylan wrote the Ballad of Emmett Till about the 14 year old Negro boy who was lynched and hung for whistling at a white woman. A better known song from the 1963 Times they are a Changin' album is the Lonesome Death of Hattie Carrol, which Dylan performed before Hurricane on this fall's Rolling Thunder tour.

"William Zanzinger killed poor Hattie Carrol,

With a cane that he twirled 'round his diamond ringed finger"

Hurricane, written with the strength that maturity has brough Dylan, now in his mid-30's, will utlimately be judged as the more important song if it does help free Carter from prison, where he has languished for ten years. The latest word is that a retrial date is expected within a couple months.

"All the criminals in their shirts and their ties,

Are free to drink martinis, and watch the sunrise,

While Rubin sits alone in a 10 foot cell,

An innocent man, in a living hell."

Joey, based on the-small-time-hood-with-redeeming-qualities Joey Gallo is similar to Hurricane, but is more of an eulogy. A friend has remarked that of all the songs on Desire, Joey sounds the best with headphones, cranked up full blast. The thundering drums, piercing violin and wailing background vocals (by Emmylou Harris) together help to create some of the most powerfully emotive moments Dylan has ever produced.

Isis, Romance in Durango, and Black Diamond Bay, are all delightfully mysterious short stories peopled with strange characters and dream-like adventures; these songs are similar to Lily, Rosemary, and the Jack of Hearts, (especially Isis, with its ironic twists), but with the more surreal qualities of Desolation Row, (especially Black Diamond Bay).

Mozambique, the shortest liveliest song on the album is both the most insignificant and most fun, with its calypso beat and holiday-like atmosphere.

The last two songs of the first side of the record are together the most enigmatic and illusory; One More Cup of Coffee, and Oh Sister, a very difficult song played to the slowed down melody of Girl From the North Country.

Sarah, finally, is a sensitive love song and tribute to Sara Lowndes, Dylan's wife and the mother of his five children. It is so frank and pleading that one can't help wondering if it's not just a little tongue in cheek. Dylan has never previously written such a personal confession, breaking down the walls of myth around his private life,

"After taking the cure, and just getting through,

Staying up for days in the Chelsea Hotel,

Writing Sad Eyed Lady of the Lowlands for you."

Like so many others, this writer has sworn by the first electric albums, particularly Hwy. 61 Revisited, for so long that it is difficult not to be a reactionary and say that he could never again write such good songs. Yet, Desire, Songs of Redemption, is so immediately enthralling, the phrasings and vocals so succinct and precise, and the tunes and melodies so emotive that I am reminded of the wonder I felt when I first heard Like a Rolling Stone, on my six transistor radio at dawn one summer morning while doing my Globe and Mail route in North York.

Home

On Saturday afternoon the Queen's Women's Figure Skating team managed to capture second place in the Fifth Annual Invitational. The Ice Hockey Gals helped Western descend lower in the league with a 9-3 victory and Men's Volleyball hosted the OUAA Eastern Division Section I Tournament at which they walked away with 1st place. Saturday night the Basketball Gals defeated Waterloo 43-33.

Away

On Friday the men played Badminton at Ryerson and Squash at York. Both of these tournaments continued into Saturday. On Friday the Gaels played Basketball at McGill and defeated the Redmen 90-86. Saturday Queen's took to the slopes as the Alpine Skiing Gals and Gaels defeated all other entries at Calabogie. The men travelled to RMC for awrestlingtournament and the Gaels and Gals saw track and field action at Cornell. The Hockey team (Gaels) defeated Ottawa 7-4 and partially redeemed themselves after the disgraceful loss to RMC on Wednesday. The Volleyball Gals came in 6th of 12 at Waterloo tournament. The Curling Gaels came in 4th of 12 and the Curling Gals came 1st of 5. The Swimming and Diving Gals travelled to Guelph for the Invitational Meet.

Other Things

Would the managers of the Women's Figure Skating, Track and Field, Alpine Skiing, Wrestling, and men's Squash teams please leave printed materials concerning their events of the past weekend at the Journal office by Wednesday at 3:00 or phone the office at 547-5540 with an explanation. No news is NOT good news!!!

Penny Wedd of the Queen's Gals drives in to score one more hoop for the Tricolor squad on Saturday. Queen's 43 - Waterloo 33.

Queen's reigns Victorious!

Basketball Gals chalk up one more

Lyn Atwood

Saturday, January the 17th the Queen's Women's Basketball squad found themselves pitted against the University of Waterloo team. Waterloo had just previously suffered defeat at the hands of both Western and Guelph - but only by a small margin. The Queen's Gals were defeated by Western in first term and by Guelph the past two years in the playoffs. Needless to say, the Gals were looking forward to meeting the girls from Waterloo - but apprehensive about the outcome-knowing it could go either way.

As it turned out, the Waterloo team was outplayed, outhustled, outshot and outscored.

The first half of the game was extremely disappointing to spectators and players alike. In fact, the half time score probably set a new record low. The score, 11-10 for Queen's. Coaches Beck and Lisle gave their team a little peptalk on 50 ways to score a basket and Queen's literally ran the whole show in the second half - hooping 13 baskets to Waterloo's 10.

The final score was 43-33 for our Gals, which still leaves a little to be desired but goes down on record with some respectability at least.

Queen's seemed to be instigating turnovers and hustling to intercept during the entire game but up until the last part of the second half all of this action took place in their defensive end so that there were very few fastbreaks.

Queen's top scorer was Kim Headford with 16 points - 14 of those coming in the second half. Penny Wedd picked up 8 points. Mary Brunton, Sue Gillies, Kathy Keely, Laura Mattson each chipped in 4 and Pat Quigley was good for three. Pat has been recovering from an illness and saw little floor time.

Waterloo's scoring was spread among the team members with the leading score of 8 points coming from Mary Zagrodney.

Queen's captain Kathy Keely was forced into the role of benchsitter in the third quarter after obtaining 5 fouls. Other than that the Gals had relatively few fouls. The girls from Waterloo could not say the same. By the end of the game they had 24 fouls stacked up against them.

Kim Headford, a first year Phys Ed major with the Golden Gals played a good game not only as far as points go but on the boards as well. She pulled down 15 of the 7 rebounds for Queen's.

Mary Brunton and Laura Mattson also showed fine performances for Queen's as found themselves driving down on the basket more than once after hustling for an interception resulting in a turnover for Queen's.

Queen's plays its next home game on February the third when Carleton pays us a visit. Here's hoping that 'all of you' are able to join 'all of us' for that exciting game at 6:00 in Bartlett.

B-Ball Gaels finally get it together

Alps Bonwell

No one can say it hasn't been a long time in coming. In fact it's been much too long. But nevertheless it came. All season the basketball climate at Queen's has been a very arid one. Little rain ever seemed to fall on the Gaels. Their win column was a veritable desert. Drought was threatening their post-season existence.

Occasionally the Gaels would go to the well for a temporary burst of energy but not for any length of time and never, it seemed, when they were most thirsty could they get it together long enough to end the dry spell. Indeed, after the Toronto game, it looked frighteningly like the Gaels might wind up the year in an extreme state of dehydration. But now it's obvious they won't for last Saturday it finally came, the Gaels finally jelled and the storm clouds broke open: the drought ended. The game was in Montreal and the score was 90-86 over the McGill Redmen; a team that is worth mentioning for it is not easily washed away. Currently in second place in the O.U.A.A., McGill had lost by only 8 to tenth ranked Concordia, and had beaten Ottawa. Aside from that they also have 3 Americans; their presence, justified or not, tends to lend an extra measure of credibility to the team. In McGill's case the trio proved to be (virtually) the team's full measure of credibility. Two of the three hit for 37 and 18 points. Queen's on the other hand, managed to distribute their scoring a little bit more evenly. Andy Boniwell scored 19 while Dave Dempter, Corky McCleery and Dale Sandersen each made 12.

It's hard to single out any factor responsible for the Gaels sudden 'about-face' (which is a full 180 degrees after the Toronto game) for the very reason that it was a collective effort. However, special mention must be given to the inspirational pay of rookies Dave Dempster and Sandy Taylor. Still the integral element for the team's success is the fact that the players are starting to work together as pre-season reports suggested they would. The fact that this early prediction may be off by half a season only implies that the Gaels will have to play so much better from now on, to make up for lost time. (Lost time suggested by their present 1-5 record).

No doubt the Gaels have their work cut out for them yet we shouldn't forget that they have not been eliminated from the playoffs. The confidence and considerable talent of the team inspires the hope that they're capable of beating everyone left on their schedule. I suppose that the latter may seem like prime material for a prediction and forecasts of that type usually end back in the prophet's face. Leave it to say that the Gaels can and could make the playoffs if they get their desired breaks. If the Gaels start trying tonight when they take on the Redmen at RMC, the playoffs will not seem too impossible. Whatever the final outcome of the season we can be assured that the Gaels will be right in every game and, hopefully, on the top in most.

Split end in Curling

Gals 1st

The Gals curling team curled this weekend at Smiths Falls against 4 other teams, and beat them all. They now go on to represent Queen's and Eastern Ontario in the Ontario finals, Feb. 6 and 7 in North Bay. Team consists of:

Cheryl Keely - skip, Sue Morrison - 3rd, Donna Buchan - 2nd, Patty Prouse - lead.

This will be Cheryl's second time in the Ontario finals. This team is a Queen's team, even though they curl out of the Kingston curling club (since Queen's does not have a rink of its own). If you want more information, phone the coach at 549-4526.

Gaels 4th

The Queen's Mens' curling team had their first taste of university competition this season in the Brock Invitational. The curling edition of the Gaels almost had to sweep their way through the snow drifts to St. Catharines, but the Toronto bound train finally arrived almost three hours late.

Because of the transportation hassles the team was not able to hit the mattresses until 2:30am. Despite the fact that their first game was at 9am, the Gaels were awake enough to chalk up a 7-6 win over Laurentian. The Queen's skip Mark McDonald curled around the opposition's stone with his last rock to sit shot in the eighth end. Laurentian had the hammer but had to hit and stay to win the last end. Fortunately for Queen's the attempted raise failed to count as the Gaels stole two points to win the game.

In the second game Queen's played the University of Toronto rink. The Gaels threw a wrench into the big blue machine with a 17-4 victory. Being a points bonspiel each win is worth 10 points while each end won counts for one and each point of the score earns the team ¼ point. On this system Queen's led the competition with 38 points.

The final game of the competition for the Gaels was against York University who had accumulated 36 and three quarter points. Each team had won their first two games and the winners of this match were the winners of the bonspiel. Queen's fell behind early in the game and found it too difficult playing the catch-up game. York won 9-4.

York's total of 55 points gave them the trophy. Queen's fell to fourth place in the 12 team event while Waterloo and RMC placed second and third.

The east section finals were to be hosted by RMC the last weekend in January. The tournament will be played instead in Lakefield, the home ice of Trent University. York, Queen's, RMC, Laurentian, Trent, and Ryerson will take part with the top three teams earning berths in the OUAA finals at Western, February 6.

We all hope that Howard's Game Plan 76 will bring McDonald, Kitching, Tomsett and Troop home winners.

Gaels Badminton

The annual co-ed badminton tournament was held at Ryerson last Friday and Saturday. Seven universities competed, which made the round robin event exceedingly long and tiring.

There were several top players present. John Czich from RMC ranked sixth in Canada was the biggest star. His matches were watched keenly with the thought that perhaps his powerful confident style would falter momentarily and he would lose a match. But his opponents were easily defeated.

Waterloo had two excellent players, both very smooth and polished in their play. Unfortunately for them, they lacked the endurance of RMC. The confidence with which the number 1 player hit the bird and his undaunted smash returns attracted much attention from the audience.

U. OF T. continued the tradition of keeping their best players out of intercollegiate competition until the finals. There is speculation that they also will have a player ranked under ten in Canada on their team. The number 1 Toronto player viewed the tournament in a mildly mocking manner spending time mimicking Czich's pre-game warm ups. He harassed his opponents at times, criticizing their style and general competence at the sport, for the benefit of the audience.

Queen's fought onward, coming fifth in the event. The tournament provided good stiff competition, which the team needed. The results were not discouraging. If anything, the tournament spurred the team on, creating a stronger desire to beat RMC in the eastern divisionsal finals February 7.

Ski Tour

The Carleton University Outdoors Club is organizing an inter-university Ski Tour on Saturday, February 7, 1976. The tour starts near Hull, Quebec, just across the river from Ottawa and makes its way north over the 'lumps and bumps' of the Gatineau Park to the town of Wakefield on the Gatineau River. The 45 kilometer (27 mile) distance has been divided into 3 sections with checkpoints at the end of each, where skiers can find hot snacks. Transportation to the finish at Wakefield will also be available at each checkpoint.

A square dance will follow the dinner in Wakefield. Bus transportation will carry tourers back to Ottawa, Saturday evening. For those with the energy and time, there will be a skating party on the Rideau Canal in Ottawa, Sunday morning.

Billeters will accommodate out-of-town guests on Friday and Saturday nights. The cost for the tour is $7.00 ($9.00 if accommodation is required), and entry forms with further details can be found in the John Orr Room. The deadline for application is January 24, 1976.

The Central Canada University Ski Tour wants you - faculty and students.

PAYMENT OF TUITION FEES

Payment of the second installment of fees is due on or before January 31, 1976.

Remittances should be made payable to Queen's University and mailed or delivered to reach the Accountant's Office, Richardson Hall, on or before January 31, 1976.

If you find it more convenient to mail your cheque, please record your student number on the face of your cheque.

Motivated----Hockey Gaels win

Tom Shand

The attitude prevailing on the Gaels's hockey team prior to their encounter with the Ottawa Gee Gees in Ottawa on Saturday afternoon was one of a team that had learned its lesson well. The Gaels did everything that they had forgotten how to do in their Wednesday night disaster at R.M.C. The end result was a 7-4 victory over the Gee Gees. The loss virtually dropped Ottawa out of playoff contention with a 2-8 and 1 record while the Gaels moved into a second place tie with the York Yeomen at 6 wins and 5 losses.

The Gaels won with their style of game as their aggressive forechecking and strong skating took its toll on the Gee Gees' who fought gamely but finally broke down in the third period. Camel Harris made several clutch saves and although Ottawa scored four goals, Clyde had little chance on all but the second goal.

The first period was scoreless but only because of some unbelievable saves by Camel in the early going when the Gaels killed off two consecutive minor penalties. The Gaels had a slight territorial edge in the first period especially in the latter stages but Ottawa's netminder Don Hastings, with help from a big shot-blocking defence, thwarted all scoring attempts.

Bill Van Camp opened the scoring just 8 seconds into the second frame as Ottawa's Mark Aubry gave him the puck and "B.V." wasted no time in putting it away during an Ottawa powerplay. Aubry made up for his error just 29 seconds later to even up the score. Later in the period Mike Haramis scored his team leading eighth of the season when he tipped in Willie Wing's backhand shot after Geoff Arnoldi had won the draw on the powerplay. Once again the lead was short-lived as Guindon scored his first of two as he beat Clyde Harris on a backhand shot. John Cerre then put the Gaels ahead to stay at 18:36 of the second with assists going to Van Camp and Tim Hansen.

A revitalized Cerre had his finest hour of the season and opened the scoring in the third period as the Gee Gees finally collapsed. Brian Harrington then scored what ended up to be the winner and no one could have been more surprised than he when his slapshot from centre ice went through the semi- shellshocked Hasting's pads. Geoff Arnoldi, who played well in place of the suspended Doug Grills, then scored his second goal of the season with linemate Wing and Haramis receiving assists.

Ottawa notched two goals on deflections by Saunders and Guindon late in the final period but it was too little too late. Bill Van Camp put the icing on the cake when he drilled a shot into an empty net on the Gaels' 31st shot on net with only 1 seconds left to play.

If the fine work of "B.V." and "J.C." with Tim Hansen in Ottawa is an indicator of things to come from this line it will be good news for the Gaels who have had to rely on the Grills line for the bulk of their offence in previous games. Gee Gees visit Jock Harty Arena on Tuesday night at 8:00 for a return match with the Gaels. One can only hope that the Gaels don't forget how hard they had to play to earn their 2 pts. over the game Gee Gees last Saturday.

Hockey Gals tame Mustangs

by Jim LeMesurier

The hockey Golden Gals parlayed skillful play and a consistent effort into an easy 9-3 victory over the visiting Western Mustangs at the Jock Harty Arena on Saturday. The outcome was never in doubt as Queen's moved into a comfortable 5-1 first period lead and continued to dominate their smaller, weaker opponents throughout the contest.

Sue Wright, the Gal's sure skating captain was, as usual, the most impressive figure on the ice while centre Janean Gerow was the most prolific. Gerow's three goals and Paula Cervinka's pair made the line of Gerow, Gervinka and Sandy Statten the most effective forward unit in the game.

The teams opened the game with cautious play between the bluelines, reminiscent of their previous close checking encounter, which Queen's won 2-0. Janean Gerow soon changed the complexion of the contest, however, with a high drive which beat Mustang netminder Marilyn McDonald at 7:23. McDonald seemed to be fighting the puck from the outset and soon found herself in the midst of a losing battle. Janice Atkinson and Gerow quickly upped the count to 3-0 as the Gals demonstrated their offensive poise in capitalizing on the ubiquitous Mustang defence miscues.

Western momentarily cut Queen's lead to 3-1 but Sue Wright's hard shot from the slot and Judy Cook's conversion of a goal mouth scramble enabled the Gals to take a 5-1 cushion into the middle stanza. As Queen's coach Anabelle Twiddy pointed out after the game the Gals started to take it easy after grabbing this early lead and were justifiably content not to press their hapless visitors as hard as they might. Paula Cervinka made it 6-1 at the 7:14 mark and Wright picked up her second goal with a great individual effort. The speedy defenceman made a spectacular rink long rush in which she split the defence before dekking the Western goaltender on the short side.

In the final frame, Gerow completed her hat trick and Cervinka notched her second goal, while the Western gals added two of their own to round out the scoring at 9-3.

The win gives Queen's a healthy 3-1-2 record and leaves the lowly Mustangs with a 1-5 mark. The Gals balanced, disciplined attack and sound defence should make them the team to beat through the remainder of the regular season especially if the colorful Marg Bartlett returns to the lineup, in the league playoffs next month, in London.

Volleyball Gaels sweep tourney

On Saturday Jan. 17th Queen's men's Volleyball team showed its stuff against teams from RMC and York. Each team played each other twice in the tournament and Queen's finished overwhelmingly on top, clobbering York 3-2 and 3-0, and RMC 3-1, 3-0 in games. The fact that we allowed RMC and York to win only 3 out of a possible 20 games illustrates the strength our Gaels possess.

Queen's team showed a good balance of offence and defence, between power and finesse. Obviously the teams hard work payed off, as they exhibited a great deal of poise and strategy in eliminating their opposition. Both in warm up and on the court the Gaels showed class. This young team has got a lot of talent and should do well not only this season but in the future.

The Volleyball team now has a record of 5 wins and 2 losses in University play. If they win their next 2 out of three matches they will advance to the Ontario finals. Their next tournament is on Jan. 30th at Ryerson when they will be gunning for first place.

Queen's teams exhibited consistent and accurate play throughout the day and made only 2 or 3 mental lapses. The lack of spectators did not prevent any team from playing their best. In fact there was an excellent demonstration of top quality Volleyball in Queen's second match against York where we won by the narrow margin of 17-15. The team if they play with the same skill and drive as they did on Saturday a national title is by no means out of reach.

V-Ball Gals go interprovincial

by Jill Calder and Eleanor Barker

The Queen's Gals participated in a well run Waterloo Invitational tournament Friday and Saturday of this past week. Twelve teams were battling for the first place spot. The Gals ranked sixth amongst some of the best teams on this side of the country. The purpose of this tournament for the team was to provide a quick comeback from a seven week lay off and to provide forward momentum in peaking for the OWIAA tournament coming up the twentieth of next month. So in short, it was a practice tournament where the team was able to use some new free ball patterns and quick sets that were worked out during the Christmas break.

Queen's took two matches from Brockport, Lakehead and Laval fairly easily and should have won both from McGill and McMaster, but lack of concentration caused the Queen's girls to falter and split the matches. The tricolour squad played both Michigan and Manitoba at the end of long days when not being in peak form took its toll.

The highlight of the weekend for the team was its matches with the Western team, the national champs. Queen's baffled the older, more experienced team with their multiple quick sets and "never say die" will power. But the old Western team kept to their game by holding off a 13-7 advantage to win 15-13 over the disappointed Queen's squad. However, after the hard working weeks to come, the Western team may find it impossible to pull back again.

Match Results:	game 1	game 2
Queen's vs. Manitoba	5-15	3-15
Queen's vs. Western	9-15	13-15
Queen's vs. Lakehead	15-4	15-1
Queen's vs. Michigan	12-15	1-15
Queen's vs. McMaster	15-12	9-15
Queen's vs. McGill	14-16	15-6
Queen's vs. Brockport	15-8	15-8
Queen's vs. Laval	15-8	15-8

Swim Gals

The Queen's swimming Gals started the new year with a relay meet at Guelph University on Saturday. This meet attempts to get the team back in the swing of things in preparation for the Annual International Meet to be held at Waterloo next weekend. No score is kept. Queen's had entries in every event, many of which were somewhat unusual, such as the 300 yard individual medley relay and the 300 yard butterfly relay. A strong performance was also turned by the lone Queen's diver, Mary Lou Fasken, on the one-metreboard. At this point, the Christmas break is still showing its effects, and although times improved during the meet, there will be hard work to come before the Ontario finals.

She's got her eye on the Waterloo International Swim Meet this weekend. Queen's expects to do well. Good luck!

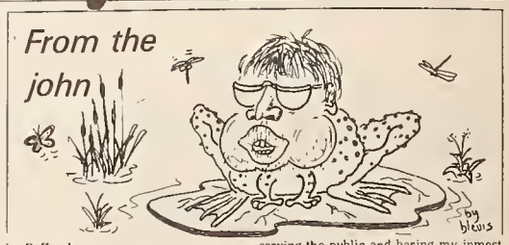
An opinion

Support the OFS rally

Giles Ghersen, Rob Reynolds

Students from Queen's and other colleges and universities across Ontario are being invited to participate tomorrow in a mass meeting in Toronto.

The purpose of the exercise is two-fold. Firstly it will demonstrate in itself student opposition to the recommendations made in the Government Green Paper on Provincial spending, (the McKeough Report), specifically Chapter Seven which deals with future government funding of post secondary education. Secondly, and most important, the mass meeting is designed to provide visible support for representatives of the Ontario Federation of Students who will be presenting a detailed brief to the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott and representatives from both opposition parties. The brief will fully explain why students in Ontario are unable to accept the recommendations made in the McKeough report.



In considering the plan of action two questions immediately present themselves. First, does it benefit Queen's students to protest the McKeough report? Second, if the answer to the first be convincingly affirmative - is this a proper and constructive method of registering opposition?

The answer to the first question must be a resounding 'yes' from any student who has taken the trouble to read the report. For those who haven't, a brief summary of its recommendations is as follows. It proposes massive tuition fee increases to around $1000 by 1979, the elimination of the grant portion of the Ontario Student Loans Programme, a freeze on funding of proposed graduate programmes, and a limitation of enrolment growth. The implications of these measures, if implemented, could primarily be to render post-secondary education in this province a privilege for the wealthy few.

Surely, though, maintenance of high academic standards at this university depends upon the ability to attract enough bright students from all socio-economic backgrounds. It is doubtful whether students lacking the financial resources to pay for their tuition would be willing to commit themselves to such an astronomical debt - especially in an era when the Bachelor degree is no longer necessarily the passport to a well paying and rewarding job. In short, the recommendations of the McKeough report must be seen as a tragic retreat from the liberal goal of a learning society, a goal to which western society has been pledged from the time of John Stewart Mill.

Because it is a report that displays little evidence of being carefully thought out, in terms of its implications and being solely concerned with convenient methods for cutting government costs, students from this university must openly express unequivocal opposition.

The answer to the second question, as to the method of protest, must also be "yes". Not only because of its possible illiberal ramifications does the report merit a visible reaction from students in this province, but also because, as a Green paper, it invites response, we should be present to lend credibility, in the eyes of the government, to the OFS, which is presenting the student position on our behalf.

Some of my many avid fans might have noticed that this column did not appear in the last Journal. This is because I am on strike. There will be no column today either. They tried to make me write one but I refused. Because I'm on strike.

I'm on strike because I want to be. This is a lonely job, you know. Turning out the boffs when you don't feel like it is like having teeth pulled. And yet I do it. Because I care. But now it has gone too far and I'm on strike. They won't get a column out of me because I'm not writing one. I'm on strike.

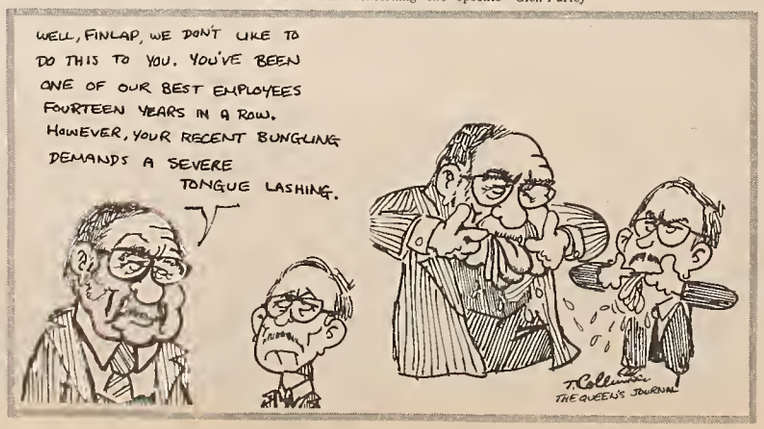
I want a living wage, plus free housing, free food, and the right to give myself whatever marks I choose to get in any work I choose to do. You may think that I'll keep this up long enough to make a column, and that the type of person who reads "From The John" will find it every bit as funny as my regular column. It won't work. People who read my column regularly are discerning intelligent people and will not be easily fooled. Besides, I'm on strike so I won't write a column.

Anyway, what I want is a chance. The way it is now I don't have one. So I'm on strike. Because I want more than I have. Believe me, it's no fun to be on strike. I don't get to render jolly all the lissom spirits who regard me as their god. I enjoy serving the public and baring my inmost thoughts and dreams. But they've gone too far this time. They started it, but I'm going to finish it. I will never write another column for them as long as I live. I'm on strike.

After all, I'm not asking much. Just the right to live like a barbarian king with dancing girls and free eats all day if I want and no one calling me names. Until I get this, I'm on strike. They won't even get a column out of me this week because I won't write one for them. Won't they look sick then. Without me they're nothing. Everyone knows that. But now that I'm on strike they're going to have to learn to get by without me until they meet my demands, which anyone will agree are reasonable.

So I would like to apologize to anyone who looks forward to reading this column, but I'm sure you understand my position. It was not an easy decision to make. I would have preferred to continue my term in office to the very end, and my family unanimously urged me to do so. But the good of the University must always come before any personal considerations. So I'm on strike. When my terms are met, I'll be back with the funniest stuff this university has ever see. Until then I'm on strike.

I'd like to take this opportunity to say hi to my mum. Hi!



Let us all have a chance

Dear ?

This is a letter to the individual with student number 140 9011 and in general to all greedy little boys and girls who make a habit of draining the library of all the books on one specific subject. This particular (oh how tempting) "individual" is represented SIXTEEN TIMES on one page in the Douglas Library circulation desk, all on the same day (January 5th), all for books concerning two specific authors, and one specific theme; ironically enough, evil.

While you are pouring over your booty, all 16 plus at once, for two weeks straight, remember that we are all in the circus together, yet with some people, their greed is only restricted by how much they can carry in one trip.

Yours sincerely
Glen Farley

Banners blazing, placards to the skies, OFS supporters march on Queen's Park on Wednesday. Approximately 34 Queen's students were in attendance.

OFS rally on the march...

Rob Reynolds

After the rally at Convocation Hall the mass of students began marching to Queen's Park.

The OFS marshalls had the route well planned and had obviously informed police as constables directed traffic away from the path of the march. In fact there was a minimal number of policemen along the route, but several plainsclothese officers were evident in the large crowd which assembled at Queen's Park.

The long line of marchers crowded into the area in front of the Legislature Building to hear the speakers. While waiting for the speeches to begin, protesters chanted slogans such as "Fight, Fight...Education is right."

John Shortall, OFS Chairperson, was the first to address the crowd. Shortall told the protesters, "We are here to protest against the Henderson Report," to which students began chanting "we want Bill" presumably referring to Premier William Davis. Shortall then reiterated the point made at the rally that "we're not talking about the students but all aspects of the Henderson Report."

Then came Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities. Parrott's opening words were "fellow students". This statement met with a very negative response by the crowd. Parrott's words continually met with chants, boos, and heckling which reflected the student's discontent with the recommendation of the Report. Parrott tried to reassure the crowd by stating that "tuition fees would not increase for the 76-77 session." The crowd responded chanting "77-78."

Parrott then reminded the student protesters of their "responsibility to the future of this province." In spite of loud student response, Parrott continued, "the Henderson Report reflects that one must look at the fiscal gap of the province." In conclusion, the Minister stated, "I believe it (government policy) should reflect this and the government believes it should."

After the speech, Journal reporters managed to question Parrott. When asked about the future of the report, Parrott said, "it cannot be stated more clearly that the Report will never be adopted in total but will be adopted on "intent".

Upon being questioned about the possibility of the grant portion of OSAP being cut out, Parrott replied, "the proposed grant policy will probably not be implemented." Parrott further stated, "when looking outside our province, you'd find that our grant to loan system is not so bad."

When asked if the rally had influenced him to re-evaluate the government's position as to the Report, Parrott replied, "we would have reviewed the Henderson Report as thoroughly with or without this rally."

Student leaders feel that the rally and march did serve to unite students on the issue of government cutbacks in the social sector. This debate with government is not over and indeed the reaction to the Henderson Report is only a beginning. Maybe active protest has not died in the '70's. As one government official at Queen's Park stated, "sure as hell looks like the '60's."

In the plenary...

Alan Mann

On arriving at U of T's Convocation Hall the first thing that was apparent was the organization. Universities had already been assigned seating areas, and were directed immediately to their allotted areas upon disembarking. Papers, pamphlets and books were being distributed throughout the Hall and on the front steps. They generally were protests against the Henderson Report or calls for student-worker solidarity, but some were merely propaganda for various left wing societies.

Chaired by John Shortall, OFS chairperson, the rally consisted of several speakers addressing a hall packed with placards and people as well as those students outside listening to the speeches via the P.A. system.

Throughout the speeches, a few points were stressed by all. The need for a student-worker alliance was the one most commonly heard. This alliance was symbolized by the attendance of striking members of CUPE local 1222, workers from the U of T.

Shortall read a few telegrams supporting the day's actions. From the Brock Student's Union came the report that even though physical support was not possible, the B.S.U. supported the rally in spirit, as did NUS. The most powerful indicator of national student solidarity, however, came from New Brunswick where the post-secondary students went on a three-day strike starting Wednesday morning.

Many of the speakers said the same things, that the increase of the loan portion and an increase in tuition would bar persons from lower socio-economic groups from post-secondary education, that this rally would show that there was an Ontario student movement, and that this rally was for all students in Canada. The one speaker that pointed out many more ramifications of the Henderson Report was neither a student union leader nor a member of the OFS. He was Walter Pittman, President of Ryerson. He spoke clearly, precisely and with feeling and meaning.

Pittman looked at the past and said, "All one can do is look back with remorse," explaining that in the 60's everyone felt that all problems "from employment to teen-age pregnancy" could be solved by university. "Equality of educational opportunity," he said, "was the key phrase of the '60's.

"What is the problem facing us today?" he asked. "What is the policy of the future?" Pointing out that this year was the last year of the Federal-Provincial cost sharing arrangement, he warned that we were taking on both levels of government. "Don't be sucked in by the need for confrontation." He added that the effects that such a policy would have on welfare policies, on hospitals and on other government-supported services were just as important. "Don't put yourself in the position of battling them, join them." He closed with a reminder of with whom and with what the rally was concerned. Te Pittman the rally did not concern post-secondary education, but "the education system as itself." He contended that the people at the rally should "fight for all those who want to learn. Not only the student from 18-24 but the 30, 40, 50, and 60 year old students." Students should support the trade unions trying to implement education leaves. He finished on the note that the "growth production type of economy" was over and that it was being replaced by a "learning society."

After Pittman came more speakers and at 3:15, Shortall announced that it was time to march to Queen's Park and the 2,000 people in attendance prepared to leave.

In a post-rally interview, Keith Norton, MPP for Kingston and the Islands and recently appointed Parlimentary Secretary to the Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough, stated that the recommendations of the McKeough Report are reasonable. Norton referred to the method by which the McKeough Report cut government spending as a "hatchet job".

Although he doesn't agree with the way that the report was done, the soft-spoken Norton would not rule out student fee increases. When asked about increased government funding of universities, Norton pointed out that "it would not be fair to society if student fees were reduced." In respect to the present level of tuition fees, Norton stated, "realistically student fees cannot be frozen."

Norton turned the question around by asking where the money might come from to further subsidize universities. One member of the group, Peter suggested that it might come from increased taxation of corporations. Lane noted that corporate profits have been increasing for years and that corporations should be forced to pay in the same manner as individual taxpayers.

After disputing Lane's source of information, Norton stated that he would get the figures from the minister at his next briefing.

Although Norton does favour higher student fees, in line with the recommendation of the McKeough Report, it must be noted that he did not endorse the manner in which the report was done.

Increase in grants for students

Cathy Black

Is the purpose of Queen's to be that of a job training school or a centre for education in a more classical sense? Perhaps this question can be answered through film. Some students and faculty of Quarry Films, Department of Film Studies, will examine this question and others in a film to be shown in Orientation Week '76. The A.M.S. is supporting this effort with a $1,000 grant.

The four student filmmakers are Mike MacMillan, Michael Creagan, Yan Moore and Rohin Russell. MacMillan, the principal organizer of the film, stressed to the Journal that the film is not intended as a statement, but will ask questions and present many viewpoints. The film will make use of interviews and conversations, not only inside the university, but also outside, in the community. Robin Russell, working mainly on the visual aspect of the film, told the Journal that they intend to aim for less narration, with the emphasis on a variety of interpretations in dialogues.

In addition to exploring the actual purpose of the university, MacMillan mentioned as a major theme of the film, the relationship of the university to the community.

Among other themes to be examined will be the question of universal access to university and the implications of financial restraints.

The total cost of the film is estimated at $3,500. This sum is considerably smaller than that expended in 1969, when another film about Queen's was made, costing closer to $12,000. The difference in cost is due to the development of the Department of Film Studies in the past few years and it is no longer necessary to expend large sums of money on purchases, rentals and the hiring of professional photographers.

When the film is completed, it will not only be used in Orientation Week, but also in high schools. MacMillan proposes that it should go "into Mac-Corry at lunch-time, into the pub, into a concert."

New film for Queen's

An increase of $11.45 million in the 1976-77 budget of the Ontario Student Assistance Program has been announced by Dr. Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities. Grants to students will total $61 million, up from $49.55 million this year.

Students' educational costs and financial resources are calculated to assess the amount of money they may receive. In 1976-77 assistance up to $1,000 will be provided as a Canada Student Loan which must be repaid. Students needing more assistance may receive it in the form of an OSAP grant which in most cases does not need to be repaid.

Many OSAP allowances have been increased as a result of recent evaluations of student needs. OSAP board-and-lodging and miscellaneous allowances will be increased to $57 from $51.50 for students living away from home, and to $36 from $32.95 per week for students living at home. Book allowances are being increased approximately 10 percent and the OSAP grant for local transportation will rise to $8.

Tuition fees will remain frozen in 1976-77 and federal price controls will apply to colleges and universities.

Parrot noted that the demand has increased for student assistance much faster than enrolment. Demands for assistance rose 11 percent over 1974-75 while enrolment increased by only 5½ percent in the same period.

Parrot urged students to apply early so that they can know at an earlier date the results of their application.

The Ministry of Colleges and Universities is preparing a booklet, Ontario Student Assistance Program, 1976-77, to be distributed to educational institutions throughout the province in March.

Ministers' Meeting

Darcy McKeough, Donald Irvine, Thomas Wells, James Auld, Claude Bennet and Dennis Timbrel, provincial cabinet ministers, will attend a meeting with local officials on Friday at 1 p.m. in the McArthur auditorium. The topic of discussion will be the need for restraints and the provincial program for those restraints.

Brockington visitorship

This year's Brockington Visitor is Claude Ryan, journalist and publisher of Le Devoir. He will be on campus during the week of March 8.

Ryan was born in Montreal in 1925 and grew up there. He studied in Montreal and Rome. For 18 years he was the secretary general of L'Action Catholique Canadienne and in 1962 he joined Le Devoir as an editorial writer, a position he held until becoming editor and publisher in 1964.

Under Ryan, Le Devoir has maintained its independence politically both siding with and at other times criticizing the provincial political parties. He was one of a group of prominent Quebeckers who wanted the government to negotiate with the FLQ during the crisis of October 1970. Although he has never supported separatism, Ryan has strongly advocated a special place in Confederation for Quebec. As one of the founding members of the Committee for an Independent Canada, Ryan has always stood for moderation, good government and the preservation of French Canada.

Besides Le Devoir Ryan has written articles for such magazines as Saturday Night, Financial Post and Maclean's.

Dunning Trust

"Education is the root of the future"

Susan Paju

Harold Town and Louis Applebaum represent "two facets of the vital soul of society"; appropriately the two prolific artists spoke on "creating a climate for creativity", on Tuesday night in Dunning Hall.

Speaking first, Applebaum stressed the importance, now and in the year 2000, of a climate in which people are encouraged and allowed to do their best. Unfortunately such a climate does not presently exist in Canada; Applebaum blamed this situation on the attitude of most Canadians towards artists.

Canadians tend to regard creative artists as "social misfits", this attitude is reflected in our economy which forces artists to be "economic misfits" as well. Applebaum declared that our "artists are paid only by product and not by process" for artists must subsidize themselves during the time in which speculation of their products is occurring. Applebaum continued by stating that we also tend to undervalue the product.

As solutions to these deterrents to a creative climate, Applebaum suggested that we reassess the present status of our artists and recognize the time required to "get the products" - the latter could be achieved through government subsidy. Government subsidies exist today; however, they are not sufficient. Applebaum commented that the Canadian government "handles both art and science on an insufficient basis."

While government subsidies are a viable method of creating a climate for creativity, Applebaum revealed his fear that art support could easily "become a weapon in the hands of politicians and bureaucrats." Applebaum explained that the imposition of culture on government through bureaucratic processes could result in an organized and systematic progression of art. A possible consequence of such supervision is control of art which would result in mediocrity, as "artists are meant to lead, not follow." Expressing his hope that never would "a climate where creators work for civil servants" develop, Applebaum pointed out the existence of structures that could prevent this control of art; namely the Canada Council and the Ontario Arts Council. While these structures are not a guarantee against control (as they operate under a ministry) they "can appreciate the need to protect rather than direct."

In closing, Applebaum again insisted that Canadians "reinstate artists into the mainstream of life."

The near-capacity size audience remained appreciatively silent throughout the course of Applebaum's discourse; this was not the case during Harold Town's lecture. Choosing to remain seated while speaking, the infamously outspoken advocate of free speech began by accusing Canada of importing rather than developing art.

Unruffled when an indignant member of the audience labelled him "racist", Town stated that "until we have standards of criticism that immediately assess the culture of other countries, we have no chance for the future." Elucidating, Town called Ottawa the "rectum of the world" for her habit of exhibiting the "scum of other countries" - this also illustrates Canada's "slavish, ridiculous concern for what's fashionable in New York." The problem is, observed Town, that "at the museum level there exists a desire to be obscure and arcane". Town declared that if Canada is to show imported art, it should be that countries best (eg. Van Gogh, Vermeer).

"We aren't going to understand our culture until Canadian museums show Canadian art," stated Town. He also suggested that the executive levels of museums be changed every 5 years to avoid hierarchy and arcane desires; similar treatment should be given to art schools.

Town differed greatly with Applebaum in stating that artists should be separated from society - it is this separation which "fuels" them. Town stated that democracy is a necessary element for creating a climate for creativity, as it allows this separation to occur, he cited Russia and China to illustrate his point that separation is necessary. Free society "may starve the artists but it allows artists to be artists."

On the topic of grants, Town - who is proud to admit that he has never received a grant - emphasized that "you are not owed something automatically just because you are an artist." Town agreed with Applebaum that a government subsidy system is necessary, however, it should provide for those artists with true talent, not just the "sensational star (arcane) figures."

A question period following the lecture brough forward two elements necessary for the creating a climate for creativity. Applebaum, in a business-like manner, advanced the idea that we must commit ourselves to "selling" Canadian art, and to convince apathetic, uninterested neighbours that Canadian art is really important. This proposal is directly related to an appreciation of art by the masses, and appreciation can only be achieved through proper, standardized education at the primary, secondary and post-secondary school levels. The discussion ended with Applebaum's comment that "education is the root of the future."

Like it isn't

Like It Is magazine has agreed to change its name. Kingston lawyer Robert Kennedy was told January 15 that the issue of the campus-oriented publication currently in the production process would carry a notice asking for suggestions for a new name.

Kennedy informed Like It Is by letter December 18 that the name of the magazine had been copyrighted since Dec. 22, 1971 by Norma J. Pickering and Dr. Edward E. Johnston. Pickering and Johnston are authors of Like It Is, a booklet on sex education directed at teenagers.

Gary Price, publisher of the magazine, said that the spring issue of Like It Is will carry that name. A contest will be held to find a new name, he said.

Conserve art!

Barb Nyland

Many people who have entered museums and art galleries have probably found them darker and more humid than is really comfortable. This is not the result of a conspiracy by the curator to stop you from viewing the exhibits. According to Dr H. Hodges of the Department of Art, the strict control of humidity and light is very necessary to preserve objects of art.

Dr Hodges, speaking at a Chemistry Department seminar, described the problems faced by the chemists who are being hired in increasing numbers to work in museums and art galleries. He stressed the need to study tolerable levels of humidity. Recently in a Cnadian museum a Kayak was purchased and placed in a room which was too dry. This caused the boat to split from end to end

The amount of salt which is brought in from the streets during a Canadian winter can create problems for the museum chemist. The salt can diffuse into the air and cause the corrosion of metals.

The chemist should also be consulted about the materials used to line showcases, according to Dr. Hodges. Some silks will give off a sulphur compound which will cause blackening of silver.

The use of chemical knowledge would stop unnecessary destruction of artifacts. A pewter plate was damaged in a British museum when, for realistic effect fresh fruit was placed on it during an exhibition. After a few weeks the fruit started to decay and the organic acids produced etched lines in the plate. Dr. Hodges also described an incident where lead medals which were stored in a cardboard box developed a white crust over them. The white crust was lead carbonate which had formed because of the acidity of the cardboard boxes.

The chemist is also concerned with authenticating objects of art. Dr. Hodges stated that many of the materials used by early man are now known but the forger seldom knows the correct material to use.

The reactions known to everyday chemists are often no help to the museum chemist, Dr. Hodges emphasized. Many of the processes which are destroying art objects have been going on for hundreds and even millions of years. Obviously chemical experiments have not been performed which have lasted that long.

Hall: 'the system works well'

Bob Reynolds

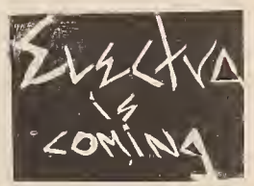
When Ross Brown, candidate for Vice-President (University Affairs) was asked if students felt alienated, he replied, "They are not alienated," but, "they (the students) don't show any interest in finding out what is going on." The answer to better communication between students and their government, according to Cindi Hall, candidate for AMS President, lies in the Faculty Societies.

When asked if the AMS needed rearranging, Hall replied, "the system works well as it is." Brown did, however, point out that as Vice-President (University Affairs) he would try to acquaint students with the actions of the AMS to increase communication.

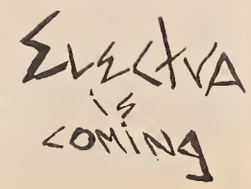
The trio stated, when questioned about the committee structure of the AMS, that two areas need work. One are deals with the question of honoraria where, according to Hall, "the difference between honoraria and wages needs to be stressed." The other area which requires more committee work deals with the question of the student status for members of the executive.

Bob Butterill, candidate for Vice-President (Operations) when questioned on the level of student support for Bus-It, stated that "there is a need for the University to contribute in addition to the $3." Butterill noted the reasons for Bus-It as being two-fold: one reason for the continuance of Bus-It being to reduce the alientation of West Campus residents from main campus; the other reason being that students, due to lack of housing, are being forced to move further from Campus.

Butterill does not feel that services such as the typing service, "need run at a loss." Butterill also noted that one "cannot make generalized policy," but "must investigate the individual service." Upon further questioning the Vice-Presidential hopeful stated that he would allow the service to continue to run at a minimal loss, "if there is an expressed need for the service."



When asked what they would do about the staff and faculty not contributing to the new University Centre, Bob Butterhill replied, "they should pay." Cindi Hall, however, replied, "We hadn't really considered it."



After being quiet voiced about the many community services which Queens' provides, Hall pointed out "that community services are necessary" and that, "students are members of the Kingston community." Hall described the Job Bank as "fulfilling a need to the community." Ross Brown mentioned the practical experience that is gained by the students who participate in programs such as Tele-Clinic.

This trio does not see any need for student fees to be increased. As Butterill stated, "they appear to be sufficient." Butterill also noted that students "have a right to demand quality and efficiency" in referring to the way that the money was spent

The trio, when asked if the AMS input into the University structure was sufficient, stated that the input was "disorganized." Then Hall pointed out that student senators "have ties cut with faculty societies." In order to aggregate student input, the trio suggested a greater degree of discussion between faculty representatives, the AMS and student senators.

When asked if there had been a philosophical void in the leadership of the AMS over the past few years, Hall replied in the affirmative. She stated that the void had developed because past executives had become "too involved with day-to-day affairs." In order to alter the situation Hall would "go beyond what happens day-to-day," because "philosophy is long-term planning."

Socialists: co-operation, not competition

Sarah Yarnell

Ed. Note: The Socialist Slate has decided to represent themselves as a collective as a fundamental part of their perspective and platform. For this reason, names of the five members of the ten person slate who were interviewed for this story have been left out.

The goal of the Socialist Slate is to broaden the outlook of Queen's students and increase their awareness of what is happening in society.

The group said that current problems of the university, such as shortage of funds, cannot be viewed in isolation. The university is an integral part of society, and "you can't change the university without changing society." Unfortunately, according to the socialists, students have not begun to address themselves to society's problems.

Today's "economic crisis is due to the situation under which we live," according to the socialists. They said that decreasing corporation profits have eventually led to cuts in both university funding and workers' wages. Workers are the ones who are having to pay for the downfalls of our social system, claimed the group collective.

The socialist slate stressed that students must unite with labour and express solidarity with postal workers and library workers. Together with labour, students should confront the government over wage and price controls, and "force the government to retreat." They said that choosing not to confront the government is to follow a "policy of defeat."

Agreeing that their socialist goals were distant and utopian, the slate proposed several "stop-gap" measures. "Students should start confronting landlords in Kingston, and should mobilize their buying power to get the landlords to be more reasonable," they said.

Food co-operatives should be set up because students and other members of the community "are being ripped off by" large chain stores which are more interested in profit than nutrition.

The group said that although Kingston currently has enough day care centres, there would be need for another in one or two years. If elected, they hope to include day care in the AMS budget

The group said that they would fight to protect non-tenured faculty and support staff who may be fired due to financial cutbacks. They urged that students support labour in their struggle, as the Ontario Federation of Labour has recently supported the Ontario Federation of Students. A strike support committee should perhaps be set up on campus, said the socialists.

The Kingston community should be encouraged to make greater use of the libraries and athletic facilities on campus, they said

If elected, the slate said they would fill the executive and Inner Council positions with themselves and their supporters. They place dances and pubs low on their priority list but said they would not discourage other students from organizing these services and events

The socialist slate said they felt they could run the AMS as a collective, using group decision-making. Currently, the AMS constitution outlines specific responsibilities of each executive and Inner Council member. When asked how they would deal with this fact, the socialists replied, "We haven't really dealt with that question yet."

Kathy Wood

Avis: students vs. landlords

In response to the question of how his executive would keep students from becoming alienated from the AMS government, Jamie Avis, candidate for AMS President, said that the AMS would "maintain a high profile in order to keep students better informed. The AMS has an obligation to tell people what it is doing" Avis said that the team would hold an "AMS night" during orientation week where frosh could find out about AMS services, policies and openings for student participation.

Kathy Wood, candidate for Vice-President (University Affairs), said, "I'm not worried about the structure of the AMS. I'm concerned about the people in it," when asked if the AMS needed streamlining or revamping.

Avis noted that he "would like to see a greater cross-section of students on the committees of the AMS. Wood added that membership on a committee, can be a learning experience. Wood is chairperson of the AMS daycare committee which had several students going into the community to assess the need for daycare centres in the city.

The team of Avis, Steep and Wood stressed the need for an organization of students tenants. The landlords are evading rent review, are charging rents which are too high, and are not properly maintaining the buildings in which students live, said Wood.

On the issue of Bus-it, Steep, candidate for Vice-President (Operations) indicated his team's hard line stand when he said they would not tolerate the university imposing "back door tuition fees." Steep, who is also currently Vice-President (Operations) and is involved in this year's Bus-it negotiations, stated that the university must pay its 40 percent share of the cost. Steep said that without Bus-it there would be increased pressure on housing in Sydenham ward and that the university's commitment to students at West Campus would not be fulfilled.

What happens when a service, in particular the typing service, loses money? Steep said that this service "should be given another chance."

When faced with the question, "Is the AMS necessary in view of student representation on the Senate?" Avis, Steep and Wood were positive "The AMS is necessary here because of the form of debate it offers," said Wood. Avis stressed the importance of better liaison between the Senate and the AMS as a way to aggregate student input

Finally, Avis was asked if he felt there had been a philosophical void in the leadership of the AMS. Avis hesitated, saying he did not wish to heavily criticize past AM presidents, but admitted that there had not been "enough all round leadership." He said that more philosophical leadership was needed, "but we need a firm financial base also."

The team said that they would prefer to have really high quality concerts at Queen's instead of many mediocre ones. Avis, Steep and Wood suggested that the Campus Activities Commissioner should co-ordinate activities such as speakers as well as dances, so that conflicts between the dates and times of events do not prohibit students from enjoying as many as possible

Arena ice

Dear Editor,

I do a fair amount of skating at the Jock Harty Arena, and every time I'm there, I hear somebody complaining about the crowds or the condition of the ice surface. I know of no solution to the crowd problem, but the ice is another matter.

If people would only give the ice a chance to dry after it has been flooded, they would find that the surface would stand up much better to the treatment that it gets. The arena staff can't force us to stay off, so it is up to us. Therefore, I ask you, please give the ice a chance to set before you start skating. That way, we can all enjoy it more and the new minutes of skating time that is lost will more than pay off in better conditions.

Thanks,
A Fellow Skater.

Forever hot

Dear Editors,

I noticed with interest in a recent Journal that attempts are being made to cut costs at Queen's, specifically energy costs. I am glad to hear that during lunch hours office lights are being turned off

I would suggest that thermostats could be turned down as well. I work part-time in the library in Mackintosh-Corry Hall, and find the temperature there ridiculously high. I am sure that students and faculty members at Queen's can learn to survive with the thermostat at 68 degrees or so - most other people are learning to!

Honour list

Dear Editor,

There is no way for Bill Roberts, ha ha ha. This is a fun reporter's typewriter, I feel like Jimmy Olson and his trusted typewriter, Fred. Being a good friend of Clark Kent (we all know who he is) we, Fred and I, are ready and roaring to go and cover some natural disaster on Campus, all for the Queen's Urinal. Twas a fortunate occurence that my other good friends from the USS Enterprise left their tri-corders and fazers. Now, nothing in this hallow place escapes me, absolutely nothing. Mother mind your daughters and fathers your sons. Man's body is made up of carbons, basically, therefore, to exclude carbons from the honour list is a grave mistake.

Love and Kisses,
Jimmy Olson

Latent racism

Dear Editors,

In his letter to the Journal on Jan. 16, Mr. Berman referred to "the ugly streak of anti-semitism that runs beneath the surface of Canadian society." While many remain unaware of this problem I believe Mr. Berman has correctly perceived a most distressing situation. Unfortunately, several occurrences at Queen's recently serve to illustrate the reality of anti-semitism on this campus. In the last few days a Jewish student at Queen's has received two threatening phone calls from a person who described the presence of Jewish students at this university as an "infiltration" and "pollution". In the second of these calls the anonymous speaker demanded that all Jewish students leave this campus "where they don't belong" or else he claimed he would help to force them out. One hardly need emphasize the despicable character of the racist persecution exhibited in this harassment.

We are unfortunate at Queen's that the bulk of our student population is of a similar cultural background. Unhappily, such cultural seclusion does not allow for the valuable interchange of views and experiences between people of varied origins. While our experience does not encourage the development of tolerance, surely our principles demand that we encourage the equality, diversity and tolerance so needed in our society.

An economy in recession tends to bring out the worst in society - surely the experience of Germany in the 1930's has taught us that. Too often it is revealed that liberating principles which seem to be well grounded in our society are shown to be superficial constructions which are quickly eroded by economic instability. For example, in Britain today the National Front is gaining sway, based on a right-wing anti-semitic platform. As Canada's economic position appears uncertain, similar reactions could easily develop in Canada. I suspect that the recent racist harassment at Queen's can only be understood in this light. Especially in these times we must strengthen our commitment to the fundamental principles of equality and tolerance and attack the racism which threatens them.

Ex-pro-Israeli

Dear Editors,

Ever since June 5th, 1967 when it took me an hour to comprehend that the recurrent phrase "pre-emptive strike" was an euphemism for sneak attack, I have been conscious of the pro-Israeli bias of the "neutral" media. It was therefore, at least refreshing to see the pro-Arab interpretation in the January 8th Plaestine article.

The explosion of moral outrage was predictable. Bias in the nominally uncommitted media is an Israelite prerogative and it is amusing to see who hops how when the boot gets onto the wrong foot

To my fair rose

Dear Editors,

Years have past since I first wrote you, but the way I feel has not changed. I know you never answered any of my other letters, but I know, also, that this is only part of your "hard to get' game. Someday you will marry me and we will run away to darkest, deepest Kenora to a life of unending bliss.

For now though, I'll be content to worship you, my fair rose, from afar, watching over you and protecting you from evil and temptation. Until the day comes that I am able to leave my responsibilities here at Star Fleet Command I am ever yours in love

Queen's arts centre bounced by university upstaged as funds

Theatre as designed in 1959.

Alan Mann

In 1972, $32,104.93 was removed from the Queen's Theatre Building Fund Committee's (QTBFC) bank account and transferred to the Queen's Capital Campaign Fund with neither the knowledge nor the consent of the members of the QTBFC.

Set up in 1960 by the A.M.S., the express purpose of the QTBFC was, according to the A.M.S. constitution, to raise "funds for the construction of a new Queen's Theatre building." A new theatre building, it was felt by students and staff, was necessary since the offices and theatre of the Drama Department were inadequate for the needs and uses of the university. These offices and theatre are the ones presently in use by the Drama Department and university at large.

Plebiscite held, $10 levy asked

By January 14, 1966, the fund had raised, mostly through student donations, some $26,000. To enable the A.M.S. to borrow $1 million for the project, a plebiscite was held on January 27, 1966. It was, as the Journal said in November 1965 "on the question of a $10 addition to the Student Interest fees for the next 30 years. The University would attempt to raise the other two-thirds of the proposed cost." Dr. Corry, then Principal of Queen's, "announced that, providing the plebiscite vote is positive, he "would" make every possible effort to secure the additional funds," since "he did not see any possibility of these things going forward in the near future without A.M.S. support on the scale proposed."

The official administration stand was that "a self-imposed student levy of $10 for the next 25 years would provide...a bond This bond would...encourage more private donations as it indicates a strong desire for a theatre complex on the part of the students. Thus the student levy would significantly increase the chances of finding the funds necessary for the proposed theatre complex." (Journal, Jan. 25, 1966).On January 27, 1966 the plebiscite was passed by the students of Queen's University, only to be temporarily shelved by the Board of Trustees the next year. The Board was taking the matter "under consideration" and that was the last heard of the fee increase for the QTBFC.

Referendum results ignored by board

This failure to comply with the referendum did sufficient damage to the project to knock most of the wind out of its sails. In the second six years, the QTBFC only raised $6,000, bringing the fund to $32,109.93 by December 31, 1971.

Around this time, however, another building fund was set up by the A.M.S. This fund was for an expansion of the Students' Union Building to which the A.M.S. pledged the sum of $500,000. By December 31, 1971 the time for this pledge for the Union Building was drawing near, and the A.M.S. was nowhere near to meeting their pledge. Being aware of this, Victor G. Bradley, V.P. of the A.M.S., sent a letter to Dr. J.J.Deutsch, Principal of the University, on July 28, 1971. The letter said in part: "The subject is the Theatre Fund which presently stands at around $30,000." He pointed out "that the bulk of the money was contributed by students" and that he felt "the probability of a theatre being erected is minimal."

"The Alma Mater Society," the letter continued, "finds that it is going to have to explore every avenue to raise the $500,000 committed to the University Centre. This money seems to be one of the appropriate sources as there is little else that can be done with it in the near future...it would appear that the A.M.S. could justifiably ask that this money be released to it to be applied to the A.M.S. University Centre Account. To do this will require a meeting of the trustees of the fund..."

Trustees to decide on fund transfer

The trustees of the committee to whom Bradley referred were the four permanent members chosen by the A.M.S. to ensure the project's continuity from year to year. They were: Dr. W. Angus from drama, Dr. G.George from music, Dr. H.Tracy from classics, and Mme. A.R.C.Duncan from French. According to the constitution of the A.M.S., the Queen's Building Fund Committee by-law, article 4e, "the trust funds of the QTBFC shall be released only by unanimous consent of the permanent members of the committee, the Principal of the University and the Committee Chairman." The chairman was a student chosen by the representatives on the committee from the various campus societies.

Solicitor dubious of money transfer

Some five and one-half months later, on January 3, 1972, Bradley received a letter from D. H. Bonham, Vice-Principal in charge of finance. It was to inform him "that the university has agreed to transfer the balance in the...Fund...as part of the Alma Mater Society's contribution towards the University Centre project" and that the fund's balance stood at $32,104.93. At the end of his letter Bonham added that he "did take the precaution of discussing this matter over with our solicitors", and that they had warned "that there is some risk involved in this course of action." The cause for this risk was that they were taking money from an account made up of donations for the express purpose of "the construction of a new Queen's theatre building" to construct a completely different type of building.

But it is also during this transfer that the greatest violation of the AMS constitution seems to have occurred. The transfer took place without the unanimous consent of the four permanent members. In fact, of the three members still capable of being contacted (Dr. Tracy now lives in England), none had any knowledge at all of the transfer. Somewhere along the line their needed sanction had been overlooked.

Theatre Plan Revealed

Why mention missing money?

The need for a new Queen's theatre building was by no means diminished. The drama facilities considered inadequate in 1960 are terribly outdated now, and although the music department now has better facilities in Harrison-LeCaine Hall, the Department of Film Studies is located in a grossly inadequate building and Professor Kitses, director of the Department of Film Studies, says that although the administration "is aware of the problem, they have no immediate plans for a permanent home for us." Such a permanent home is needed. Mr. Thrift, the campus planner, said that it was only an opinion, but "if the administration said it was possible to start on such a building within the next five years, I'm sure I could find room for it on lower campus". The fact that a theatre building requires a certain type of space does not detract from Mr. Thrift's statement. He is well aware of such problems since, for his B.A. thesis, he designed a theatre.

Although the exact methods of financing such a theatre building should be discussed with the administration and the department concerned, the returning of the funds and the accumulated interest which, according to Mr. P. Austin, accountant at Victoria and Grey, where the trust fund was held, would amount to more than $42,000, would help. Also, the reinstatement of the QTBFC would go a long way in re-initiating the drive that set up the fund in 1960. The fee increase supported by the students back in 1966 could finally be put into action, or a different arrangement to secure a student bond could be arranged. In addition, the alumni who felt the theatre was so important, could be contacted. Then years ago, Principal Corry said, "As far as the Drama and Music facilities are concerned, some support from the Ontario Government may be expected, but only for the teaching function," and that "the Ontario Government can be expected to help finance" an auditorium for the university.

Engineer also wanted arts centre

Throughout all the years of controversy, debate and rhetoric, one of the most understandable arguments printed in the Journal was in the January 21, 1966 edition, reprinted here:

"I am an Engineer (which is by way of identification, not apology) but I like to think that I have a reasonable appreciation of the performing arts. I would be keenly interested in a theatre at Queen's. It could, I'm sure, be of great benefit to students, faculty, and the people of Kingston alike, in making a significant contribution to the cultural life of all. So much for the platitudes.

I fail to see how the university can divorce the financing of theatre construction from any other on campus. Any of the buildings on campus built within the last 15 years have specifically benefitted only small numbers of students and faculty; why should there be such difficulty in raising funds from the same sources for a facility that will be of benefit to us all?"

Science in China and "Pi Lin Pi Kung"

Local army camps traditionally open their gates to villagers and host the New Year celebrations. This graphic, taken from a Chinese children's book, depicts the villagers on their way to the celebrations.

Adapted from the Chevron, Waterloo

"Pi Lin Pi Kung" is a slogan describing the present extension of the Great Cultural Revolution. The campaign focuses on the traditional values which have hindered progress in China for many centuries, and are ascribed to Kung Fu-Tse (Confucius).

As an integral part of the campaign, Confucionism is compared to Lin Piao's desire for "capitalist restoration of the Soviet type". Confucius and Lin are both portrayed as wanting rule by the few over the many, based on the exploitation and suppression of the labouring people.

China can be viewed as a socialist country on the road to establishing a communist society. The Chinese find themselves in a transition period, participating the "dictatorship nf the proletariat". In the absence of private ownership of the means of production, the vast majority of the people are part of the proletariat. Thus, there is simply rule of the many nver the few. All activities are therefore geared to serve the needs of the majority of Chinese--including scientific and technological innovations.

This summary by G. Eisler leans heavily on the follnwing three articles: "Science in China Today" by Rose. Sheinin; "The Impact of the New Revolutionary Movement on Science in China" by David Cahnibers and Rachel Faggetter; "Struggle Between Confucian and Legalist Schools and Ancient China's Science and Technology" by Li Chun.

The first twn articles mentioned appeared in a Canadian journal for science and technology, Science Forum. Dr. Sheinin is associate professor of medical biophysics at the University of Toronto. Dr. Chambers is associate professur in history of science at Concordia University in Montreal. Rachel Faggeter is a graduate in Chinese history from McGill University in Montreal.

The Chinese experience shows that the political and ideological framework determines the value to society of any activity, including those of a scientific and technnlogical nature. Therefore, it is argued, political debate must be an important part of science, engineering and technolnglcat education.

Twenty seven years after liberation, the People's Republic of China is still deeply involved in a revolutionary mass movement under the slogan 'Pi Lin Pi Kung' (Criticize Lin Piao, criticize Confucius). This movement is an extension of the Cultural Revolution. No aspect of life in China can be properly interpreted and understood without some study of the Pi Lin Pi Kung campaign.

The activities are both a further consolidation of plans for China's revolutionary development and an attempt to root out the remainders of China's pre-liberation social order

Science and Confucianism

Confucius (Kung Fu Tse. 551-479 B.C.) belonged through his origins to a decadent and traditionlist class which had been the right hand of religious power. The nobility found that its power was threatened by social upsets. Confucius suggested that, in order to keep its position, the nobility found its power on moral authority instead of hereditary claims.

For 2000 years philosophical thought in China was based on Confucionism and was therefore entirely the prerogative of the scholar-official classes. Representing these reactionary classes and declining political forces in history, the Confucian school pushed a political line of retrogression.

"Death to those who mislead the people with their marvelous skill and instruments." "A superior man looks down upon all kinds of handicraftsmen." These were the ideas propounded by Confucianist scholars.

Under this reactionary rule, the talents of the Chinese people were stifled, their inventions and creations were cast into oblivion and scientific and technological progress was greatly blocked. Many very valuable scientific works of ancient China were lost owing to contempt and persecution by Confucian thinking

According to the bibliography of the History of the Early Han Dynasty, there were seven medical treatises and eleven collections of prescriptions at that time. But after the Han dynasty (25-220 A.D.), when the Confucian line became dominant, all were lost except The Yellow Emperor's Manual of Internal Medicine. The same happened to many agricultural books from that period.

Confucianists follow the line that 'everything is decided by heaven', which means that they can only have an adverse and destructive effect on the development of science and technology.

The Confusianist hated all new things and opposed all progressive scientific thinking. After Copernicus's heliocentric theory spread to China, they clung to the principle that "the law of heaven is too profound and complicated to be understood by man." They accused Copernicus of "turning things upside-down and confusing motibn with rest" and stating that his theory was "heretical and deviating from the true teachings and should not be accepted."

How similar this is to Western religious idealism which distorted advances in science to spread confusion and mysticism.

Science and the Legalists

Not all the leaders in China's long past were Confucianists. The current campaign praises a school of reformers known as the Legalists, who were traditionally held in low esteem by Chinese historians

Legalism is associated with the first Emperor of Chin, who in about 220 B.C. burned Confucian classics and is now admired for his progressive reforms, including many with technological significance such as the standardization of weights and measures.

Opposed to the Confucianists, the Legalists mounted the stage of history as the political representatives of the rising land-lord class in the Spring and Autumn period and the Warring States period. Vigorous reformers in their time, they advocated change and progress and thus played an active role in promoting the people's struggle to transform nature.

China's water conservancy work made several big achievements during that period, showing progress and improvement in engineering techniques. These projects were built by the working people and embodied their wisdom. This serves as evidence that the Legalist ideological and political line helped the development of production and science and technology.

The Chinese people gained a rich knowledge of nature in their prolonged struggle against it. This enabled the Legalist thinkers to gradually sum up the materialist view of nature and use natural science as a weapon in their long fight against the reactionary idealist thinking of the Confucian school.

Around 300 B.C. a representative of the Legalist school clearly pointed out the need of differentiating the functions of man and nature. He recognized the fact that nature is an objective reality and its movement follows its own laws independent of the political situation in human society.

On the basis of careful study of natural phenomena and analysis of the causes of the four seasons, a materialist thinker in the Eastern Han dynasty pointed out. when the sun is nearer the North Pole, days are longer and night shorter; hence summer. When the sun is farther from the North Pole, days are shorter and nights longer; hence winter. This refuted the fallacy spread by a representative of the Confucian school in the Western Han dynasty that the four seasons represented the happiness, anger, sorrow and joy of "heaven".

Legalists put forth the proposition that the universe consists of matter, exists in infinite space and is in perpetual motion. Around 1000 B.C. a reformer in the Northern Sung dynasty pointed out in explicit terms: "Heaven and earth have no connection with man. eclipses and earthquakes have their natural laws and should not be feared."

Legalists represented by Wang Fu-chih explained nature in terms of nature itself and arrived at materialist conclusions on many important questions. Applying what the natural sciences had achieved, they criticized the theory of the mandate of heaven" and the idealist view of nature held by the Confucianists, and encouraged people to get ot know nature and transform it. Thus they paved the way ideologically for the development of the natural sciences.

The legalists did not and could not go beyond the confines of the idealist conception of their historical and class limitations However, they persisted in reform and progress. paid more attention to the practical experience of the masses in production and had simple materialist and dialectic views. What was characteristic of Legalist scientists was that, as Engles described, they "almost all live and pursue their activities in the midst of the con-

Science after liberation (1949)

The tradition of excellence in fundamental and applied science goes back a very long way in Chinese history. It embraces the original discovery of incompatibility of blood groups, the earliest recognition of magnetic polarity, and the creation of cast iron, porcelain and the printing press, to name but a few example.

Of the many accomplishments of the present, suffice it to mention the first chemical synthesis of insulin in 1965, the identification of a novel ring structure in the plant alkaloid, rorifone, the launching of a space satellite, and the recent detonation of a hydrogen bomb.

The liberation, culminating in 1949, brought with it a profound reorganization of the economic, political, and social structure of the country. The Great Cultural Revolution of 1965-9 launched a widespread reworking of the cultural framework

A new stage, the Pi Lin Pi Kung campaign, was first signalled by attacks on the late Lin Piao, the renegade vice-chairman of the Chinese Communist Party, who reportedly died in a plane crash in 1971 while fleeing the country after an attempted coup d'etat.

Lin was denounced in the two major addresses delivered to the party's tenth congress held in August 1973. From that time on, public denunciation of Lin's betrayal of the revolution was widespread, but as yet seemingly unconnected to the criticism of Confucius that had begun to appear sporadically in the press. However, on January 1, 1974, the Party's New Year message pointed out that ciritism of Confucius is "a component part of the criticism of Lin Piao" thus launching the joint Lin Pi Kung campaign. Lin Piao's traitorous activities are described as an integral part of the reactionary tradition, which so hindered China's development

Political study groups in factories, scientific laboratories, universities, army units, communes, and neighbourhoods meet regularly to analyze and condemn the many remnants of Confucian thought that have survived twenty-six years of socialism.

Confucian disdain for workers and peasants, and the belief in separation of work by hand and work by head, have come in for particularly heavy criticism. Similarly, the idea that "the highest are wise and the lowest stupid" is denounced as a "reactionary and idealist view of history." Such attitudes are thought to be reflected in the ivory tower isolation of those scientist and scholars who act as if they have nothing to learn from the working people

Academics and intellectuals throughout the country thus attempt to counter their bourgeois tendencies by performing physical labour several hours a week, and also by going to work in factories or on communes at regular intervals to "rectify their style of work."

Moreover, there has been renewed insistence on the absolute necessity to unite theory and practice in the work of all professionals and intellectuals. This includes, of course, scientists and engineers, who are urged to concentrate their experimental work on serving the expressed needs of the workers and peasants and on increasing industrial and agricultural production. While scientific work is not only confined to research of immediate practical utility, the revolutionary priorities of industrial and agricultural modernization are continually stressed.

The Chinese are careful to point out that the campaign has nowhere lowered agricultural, industrial, or scientific production. On the contrary, they claim that the impetus and enthusiasm created by the movement have contributed to higher production and to increases in the number of technical innovations. This is in answer to suggestions that too much time is spent by academics with political study and physical labour.

The general priorities in science are established by a committee of the State Council for science and technology. This is made up of representatives of the Chinese Academy of Sciences and from specific ministries of health, forestry, agriculture, heavy industry, mining, etc. At the regional level are municipal, county, and provincial bureaus for science and technology, the function of which is to establish parctical priorities dictated by needs of local agriculture, industry, and health care delivery systems

The natural sciences as practised in the institutes of the Academy of Sciences range from purely basic through mission-oriented to directly applied.

An excellent example is provided by the Biochemistry Institute of Shanghai. At the fundamental end is the structural analysis of pig insulin. From combined work with the institutes of physics, organic chemistry, and biophysics in Peking, the three-dimensional structure is emerging from x-ray crystallographic analysis. The mission oriented heading embraces the study of plant viruses, polypeptide hormones, the action of polynucleotides in sced germination, and the action of chemical and biological antitumor agents.

A very fine example of applied work is found in this institute In the early phases of the insulin work, large amounts of amino acids were required. Procedures for the isolation, synthesis, and characterisation of these compounds were worked out, and put into effect in a small plant This has blossomed into a separate academy institute, the Pharmaceutical Institute, which now produces some four to five hundred chemicals for use by institutes and departments in Shanghai and often farther afield.

The life of a scientist in China became quite different from what it once was. He is required to spend several months working in a related or even unrelated practical area. This sabbatical serves two purposes: the one to familiarize the scientist with practical problems of production, which required solving; the other to permit the scientist to teach fundamental theory to applied practitioners

A simple example is the plant geneticist, gone to the country to teach fundamentals of plant breeding and to discover what characteristics could most usefully be bred into the local rice variety. The latter information served for the establishment of a research problem upon return to academia.

Traditional teaching materials and concepts have almost all been discarded New ones are being formulated to satisfy not only scientific requirements, but also those with a political and economic base. An example of reworked material was recently forthcoming from Tsinghua University, in Peking, a major focus early in the cultural revolution. The question posed was "Of two mugs holding the same quantity of tea, why does the one in which the radius equals the height use the least raw material?" The practical problem was one of economizing on raw materials, the scientific problem was that of solving the maximum and minimum value of a mathematical function

The policy of tight integration of science with economic goals is bearing fruit at many levels. One happy example is the participation of science in the development of natural resources Chinese biologists, geographers, geologists, and others are engaged in re-discovering, describing, and cataloguing the flora, fauna, mineral deposits, and the geophysical and geographic face of the whole fountry. Under the auspices of the social sciences, China's pleontological and archaeological heritage is at last being uncovered

Specific examples are provided, over and over again, in chemistry departments of universities and research institutes Working from clues provided by the traditions of Chinese herbal medicine, organic chemists have applied themselves to the extraction of pharmacologically active agents from local flora and fauna

The past twenty-seven years have seen remarkable achievements by Chinese scientists, in the face of severe technical shortages resulting from economic restrictions, and from isolation from the international scientific community imposed by internal and external conditions As a reading of several recent publications will testisy, these have been most visible in terms of the practical problems which required solution feeding and caring for the health of the people and providing a solid industrial base for the economy Fundamental research, without which progress in the applied sector cannot proceed, although not a major priority in itself, has not been neglected and is now gaining strength.

Scientific teams mix students and workers.

Mom's Menu

Sorry Charlie

Your Mother

A casserole is one of the easiest types of dishes to prepare - and to clean up after. Most casseroles are prepared in one dish, can be cooked in a short time, and comprise almost the whole meal. Basic casseroles are good to keep in mind at exam time for these reasons. It is also a good idea to prepare these dishes ahead of time and freeze them, if you really think you just might be busy at exam time. Then the casserole just has to be reheated in time for serving.

To make these casseroles go farther, you may also add frozen or canned (drained) vegetables before cooking. (Peas and carrots are the best.)

When buying tuna, the brands which are packed in spring water are the most suited for this recipe. Others tend to be too oily and give the casserole a heavy, greasy flavour.

Tuna also comes packed as chunk, flaked and solid, light and white. The most inexpensive kind is the flaked, chunk is medium priced and solid is the most expensive. Light is also cheaper than white tuna. There does not appear to be any significant difference between the varieties. None at least which would effect the quality of this recipe for tuna casserole.

Tuna Casserole (Preparation time - 1 hour, serves 4)

3 cups egg noodles
7 oz. can of tuna (drained)
½ cup mayonnaise
1 cup sliced celery
1-3 cup chopped onion
¼ cup chopped green pepper ½ tsp. salt
10 oz. can cream of celery soup
½ cup milk
1 cup old cheddar cheese (shreaded)

Cook noodles according to package directions. Drain. Combine noodles with tuna, mayonnaise, celery, onion, green-pepper and salt in a two-quart casserole dish.

Blend together and heat celery soup and milk in a saucepan. Add cheese. Heat and stir until cheese melts. Add to noodle mixture.

Bake uncovered at 425 degrees for 20 minutes.

If vegetables were excluded from the casserole, serve them with the casserole and a salad and bread as well.

Please Note: For those of you who attempt to make the Bar-B-Q Style Franks with dried celery, next time try dicing it. Its much easier to prepare and you don't have to wait for weeks for your celery stalks to dry out before you can use them.

Dunning Flicks

Film short outdoes feature

Tom MacGregor

¾ dull, ¼ funny -- not exactly a success formula, but certainly the recipe of Mike Nichol's most recent film, The Fortune, already at Dunning. However, if you didn't come late there was a true delight to be seen in Nebule the National Film Board short which accompanied the film.

Mike Nichols is an intriguing director. He has done some truly great comedies like The Graduate, some interesting black comedy like Catch-22 and even a great animal adventure, The Day of the Dolphins. In The Fortune he tries to jump on the nostalgia-comedy bandwagon with limited success.

The three stars do the best they can with the stifling script. Jack Nicholson tries something quite different as a dim-wit side-kick to a crafty Warren Beatty. Stockland Channine plays a rich heiress or more appropriately, "the fortune", who is in love with Nick (Beatty) but has to marry Oscar (Nicholson) to avoid the Mann Act of the 1930's which makes it illegal to transport a woman across state lines for immoral purposes. Obviously this is a situation comedy and it peters out expectedly and rather early. Then we shift to the inheritance question. The comedy finally starts to click with a scene featuring the hustlers trying to drown the girl in a bird bath and make it look like suicide. The last half hour is quite humorous.

However the great part of the evening belongs to Nebule. It is an animated short with a boy made out of wiggly lines and a piece of string. The string becomes every toy the boy could want, even to the point of changing into solid coloured masses, a companion with shifty eyes and a fellow adventurer into the more frightening regions of the imagination. It is a pure celebration of imagination. This is seen in just the boy's treatment of the string but it is more forcefully presented in the animation itself. Every image, colour, movement and metamorphoses flows with a brilliant sense of association and celebration.

Although the greater part of the evening is dull it at least starts and ends on an enjoyable light-hearted note.

An interview with the directors of What Love interviewed by R. Peter and G. Swift

Q — What's your views on sex and morality in our contemporary society?

SWIFT — There's nothing wrong with good clean sex. My father taught me that.

THAT

PETER — His father taught me that too.

Q — Is your up-coming show What Love a radical statement on the male-female controversy?

PETER — Uh ..yes.

SWIFT — I admire womens-libbers for many reasons but oftentimes they're full of bull, just like the rest of us. Liberation must be taken with a grain of salt. Franz Fanon taught me that.

Q — Who or what is your major influence as directors?

PETER — Raymond Douglas Davies.

SWIFT — Charles Magnificent Mingus.

Q — Your answers seem light. Are your plays light as well?

PETER — If you take them with a smidgen of pepper.

SWIFT — If the audience laughs too much it means they've missed the point. Both plays in What Love are serious, yet hopefully entertaining. But I'm turned off by intellectuals and intellectualism.

PETER — Yes, yes...I've been called a "moral anti-intellectual." It's nonsense. I'm no more anti-intellectual than the next person. At least I have the decency to be moral as well.

SWIFT — Figure that one out if you can.

Q — When does What Love open?

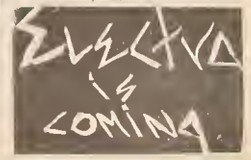
PETER — Wednesday 28 until Saturday 31 in room 102 in the Theology Building.

SWIFT — What's most important about the whole affair is that it's free. The government should follow our example when it comes to education.



PETER — This production is also a fitting tribute to the end of International Women's Year. Hope to see you there.

SWIFT — Oh yeah, I know.

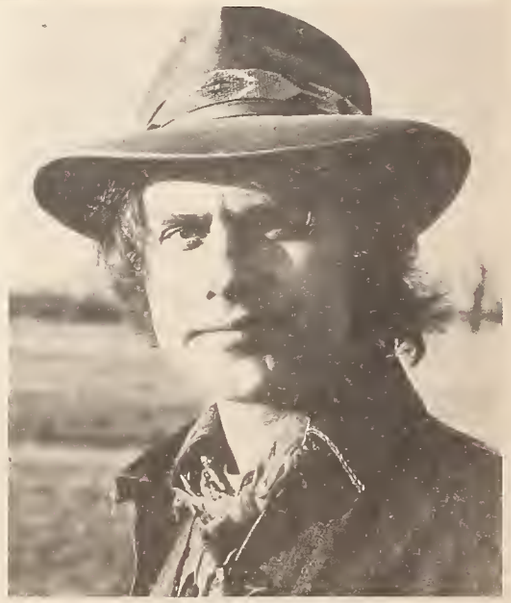
Ban Righ Fireside performance of Schubert's Trout concerto

Bitter Grounds

Man of the Blues

Anthony Kaduck



If respectful silence followed by spirited applause is any indication of a well-pleased audience, then Bitter Grounds' first venture into Blues this season was a resounding success. Michal Hasek, a well-known figure in the campus circuit, was on hand Saturday night to put on a show that left few members of the standing-room crowd dissatisfied. From the first bars of J.J. Cale's "Crazy Mama" to his ever popular singalong finish, Hasek led the not-unwilling audience through a varied and creative program with the guiding hand of a master performer. When it was over, old fans sat back and smiled and new ones, some perhaps getting their first real taste of the Blues, became confirmed believers.

It would be hard to find a better act for introducing Blues music to the coffee-house crowd than Michal Hasek, whose personal abilities with guitar, harp and voice, encompass the whole Blues range, from traditional Memphis and Delta styles to the new Chicago electric variety. He has played with many of the Blues greats - men like Lightning Hopkins, Bukka White, and Howling Woy - and his music shows the kind of subtleties that made these men famous, and that many others strive for and never find. Above all, Michal Hasek is a street musician, and his ability to totally communicate with a small audience without resorting to jokes or monologues, verges on phenomena.

This communication extends into his own songs too, which run from ballads of love and hate, through funny numbers, to the simple but unforgettable chorus "Sometimes it All Seems Wrong". When he starts into this one, a sigh came from the audience like the one Gordon Lightfoot used to get when he first brought out the Railroad Trilogy. There can be no doubt about it: Michal Hasek is a talented singer-songwriter and a consumate performer, and, with the impending release of his second album, is definitely on the way "up".

The guest set on Saturday night was performed by Amy Mareiniss who, despite a case of "Bitter Grounds Nerves", did some excellent work with songs by Jackson Browne, Steven Stills, Bruce Cockburn, and a few other composers. Her guitar playing is good, and provides a nice accompaniment to her strong, pleasing vocals.

For those interested in seeing more of these entertainers, Hasek will be appearing with "Michal Hasel, David Rea and Sundog", at the Midwich Cuckoo starting February 16th, and Amy Mareiniss will be appearing at Arts Festival this week.

Dan Hill at Jean Royce Hall

A tired, barefoot Dan Hill performed Wednesday evening in Jean Royce Hall at West Campus to an almost packed house.

Hill sang his familiar hit, "Growing Up in the Shadow of the U.S.A.", as well as other songs about his career ("Goodbye RCA") and about his childhood in Don Mills, Ontario.

The performance was part of Snow Drift '76, the McArthur College winter carnival.

Hill showed good audience rapport. Although he sounded rather idealistic, he was, nevertheless, very convincing. Because of the cordial atmosphere, the concert was pleasing to listen to. Hill sang one encore.

St. George and the Collegium Musicum

On Saturday, January 24 at 8:30 p.m., Queen's Music Department will present an admission free concert in St. George's Cathedral by the Collegium Musicum, under the direction of Margaret McLellan.

The focus of the concert is on vocal and instrumental music of the Court, during the Spanish Renaissance. Thirty-two singers and instrumentalists will participate in the event. Instrumentation includes recorders, harpsichord, guitar, organ, krummhorns, percussion and viols. The program features songs about courtly love from fifteenth century Spain, and Spanish renaissance carols which latter are characterized by great rhythmic vitality and joyous accounts of the Christmas story. The highlight of the program is Victoria's Mass "O Quam Gloriosum". The best known of the eighteen Masses written by this composer, this work is contained in the 1583 publication of the First Book of Masses, dedicated to King Philip II of Spain. Soloists for the Mass are Julia du Prey, Mary Picot, Byron Harker and Christopher Hunt.

Margaret McLellan, this year directing the Collegium Musicum is familiar to Kingston audiences in several areas of music making. An accomplished pianist, she is Assistant Professor of Music in the Music Department at Queens; Assistant Conductor and accompanist in the Kingston Choral Society, and for fifteen years was Director-singer of the well know Cecilian Consort.

The Queen's Collegium Musicum, established by Dr. Wilbur Maust some four years ago, has been attracting a growing audience and the concert on Saturday evening, concentrating on the music of fifteenth century Spain, should provide a delightful evening's entertainment.

Beatles come to town

by John Lennon, MBE

Yes friends, the Beatles got together for a benefit concert at Queen's this week. Unfortunately it was a secret reunion, so nobody knew about the concert and it made no money.

They opened with a hit from their past: "A Hard Days Night." This was probably to symbolize the loneliness which they have felt artistically in the course of their separation. They moved from there into a medley of poorly conceived and ill executed stuff. Very Nondescript.

But then it happened. The old magic came back. Suddenly there was emotion and electricity and all sorts of great stuff in the air, most of it legal in some states of the the U.S.A. The Beatles when they're good can lift you like a good kick in the gut, and leave you with the same happy worn out feeling. They were good. My stomach hurt for three days.

The fantastic foursome seems to have adopted a new "look... They came out dressed as water buffalos, and a major part of their act was to prove that they were in reality cosmic duodenums of rarely achieved periphrasis. The implicatons were multitudinous, maybe more.

Without the Beatles, there would have been no Trudeau-mania. And they certainly showed why at this concert. The blocking was tight, the music loud and "Groovy", and the audience happy as a pig in stuff. If you get the chance, travel back in time and see the concert. Words cannot explain the beauty that was there revealed as if from heaven.

I'd like to take this opportunity to say hi to my mum. "Hi, Mum".

Snowmobile Championships

The first ever Ontario Snowmobile Championships will be held at the Kingston Speedway Saturday and organizers are gearing the program to those who can brave wintery conditions to watch exciting races.

A special bonus is also being offered the student's way, as organizers have reduced the admission price in half and student's displaying their card will be admitted at $1.50

For that price they should be treated to at least 60 races throughout the afternoon as over 200 drivers from across Ontario are expected. The races start at 1 o'clock

Snowmobile racing just hit this south eastern Ontario town a month ago but already it's results are snow-balling.

Further success is expected Saturday, January 24th when the Kingston Speedway promoters hold its major attraction of the year The Ontario Snowmobile Racing Federation Sanctioned "B" championship meet, with $2,500.00 in prize money beginning at 1:00 o'clock. Registration for drivers is between 9 and 11:30 a.m.

To date most of the racers competing are from the Belleville, Oshawa, Peterborough, Shannonville, Foxboro, Whitby and Cobourg areas

It was back on December 27th that the first ever Snowmobile race was held at the Speedway's 10-foot ice-banked track and two weeks later at another non-sanctioned event, promoters managed to attract over 100 racers. Before the day ended a total of 32 races were run-off with Charles DeMill of Belleville emerging as the day's overall winner.

Speedway organizers are expecting a turnout of over 200 machines for the Jan. 24th classic over the speedy banked track which has overly impressed the racers to date

"It's one of the best tracks I've ever raced on," said Larry Mallen of Gananoque, who was the over-all winner at the Speedway's first snowmobile card.

Mallen also said that the drivers have been promoting the track's racing condition and he predicted that as many as 250 racers could be here for the OSRF Championship Meet.

The Kingston Speedway is located on McAdoos Lane, just ½ mile north on the Division Street exit, off the 401 Highway. For information call 389-9527, Kingston.

Snowmobile Racing is relatively new to Southern Ontario, and now Kingston has it's own races out at the Kingston Speedway. To 'speed' up business, Queen's students are being offered ½ price admission.

Last Friday found the men's and women's track teams setting off, in the midst of a raging blizzard, to their favourite meet of the year, the Cornell Invitational in Ithaca, New York. Queen's is the only Canadian team to be invited to this large and quite prestigious meet. American competitors came from Alfred, Buffalo, Colgate, Cornell, Cortland State, Lehigh, Oswego State, Rochester, Syracuse, and other teams. Although this meet was not team scored, both Queen's teams exhibited great strength and were undoubtedly in the top three overall.

In the women's events, Pam Scothorn managed a second place in the shot put.

Pam's performance was a welcome return to action, following a long recuperation from an injury sustained during this summer.

Freida Davy, Leslie Lamorre, Lynn Souter, and Jenifer Heathcote survived the heats in the 60 yard dash and placed 1st, 5th, 6th and 3rd respectively, in the final.

Queen's records fell in the 1-mile run, the 440 yard dash and the 4 x 220 yard relay. In the mile event, Anne Macmillan ran a 5:33.9 4th place to upset the old mark of 5:45. Her team-mates Sue Plummer (6th) and Anne Brown (7th) both scored personal best performances. Jan Pipe ran 62.9 to change the former 440 yd. record of 64.8; Kathy Cook ran 65.3 in the same event. The women's Queen's A team (Jan Pipe, Kathy Cook, Jenifer Heathcote, Freida Davy) won the 4 x 220 yd. relay in a time of 1:53.2. Kathy Cook ran a particularly impressive leg, clocking 28.4The Queen's B team (Joanne Hiemstra, Leslie Lamorre, Laurin MacWilliam, Lynn Souter) grabbed 3rd spot with a time of 1:58.9

The women's 880 yd. run was contested by 5 Queen's women (Anne Macmillan, Lynn Andrews, Marjorie Borisfield, Sue Plummer and Anne Brown). Anne Macmillan and Lynn Andrews pulled off 3rd and 4th spots respectively, with times of 2:31.1 and 2:32.2

The Cornell meet served to show that Queen's has a strong women's team this year. With some more hard training, Queen's women are likely to be serious contenders at the OWIAA finals

There were some no less impressive performances by the men's team. Peter Becke placed 4th in the long jump and 4th in the triple jump. Don Kramer secured 3rd place in the pole vault and Gary Tetzlaff, 6th place. Kevin Thompson scored a personal best to take 2nd spot in the shot put. John Ongarato took 6th in the shot. In section II of the 2-mile run, Ian Gale ran a personal best of 9.40.3 to place 2nd. Mike DeGuida ran 9:49.3 and Jax Barr, 10:06.8. In section I, Adam Shoemaker ran an extremely good time of 9:24.6. This was a personal best run and also a close 3rd behind a winning time of 9:11.3. The winner of the race is a member of the U.S. National Team. Clyde Sheppard, Vic Gooding and Duncan Card placed 1st (51.2), 3rd (52.2), and 5th (52.4) respectively in the 440 yard dash. Bob MacCormack ran a 4:22.4 mile and John Edwards, 4:43.7. Paul Spence and Jeff Giles secured a 3rd place in the 880 yd dash with times of 1:58.8. Marc Macaulay placed 5th in the 60 yd. high hurdles with a time of 8.8. Duncan Card and Vic Gooding clocked 6.5 and 6.6, respectively to place 1st and 3rd in the 60 yd. dash.

The Queen's team scored a close 2nd place in the 440 yd relay with a time of 3:30.8 (winning time: 3.30.6). In the distance medley relay, Queen's had a time of 11:01.9 behind the winner (10:37.8). In the 2-mile relay, Queen's had a time of 8:10.2 as compared to the winning time of 8:01.7.

The Queen's Team's performances were the best in the past 5 years. Their off-track performance was quite impressive, too. Evidently, there are a number of team-members who could be "in the running" for a spot on a World Cup Soccer team. Ithaca's unique T-shirt-liquor-bagel-pasta economy was given a good shot in the arm by the team-members. Everyone is already looking forward to next year's American Pilgrimage!

Queen's Curling Club

Judith Patterson

Queen's University was well represented last Saturday at Erindale College's Annual Bonspiel, held at the Humber Highland Curling Club in Toronto.

Congratulations are extended to Gilbert Dawson and his team of Clifford Snelling and Kathy Stewart. They placed second in the bonspiel, won by Jim Morrison and his rink from Centennial College, winning their games 14-4, and 5-4. The other Queen's team skipped by Rick Jeffrey, with Wendy Munsen, Steve Ricketts, and Sharon Lillico, won their first game, and lost their second game by one-half inch on last rock.

Anyone who is interested in playing in future mixed intercollegiate bonspiels can call Judy (544-9355) or Steve (542-2143) for more information.

There is still time to enter your team in the Queen's Curling Club's first annual all night bonspiel, Jan. 24-25, from 10 p.m. to 8 a.m. Call Judy or Jamie (549-2480) to enter your team.

There have been an unacceptably high number of defaulted games in the Sunday night curling since Christmas, especially on the 11 o'clock draw. Please make an effort to get your team out curling--if you are unable to curl, please let the other team know in advance--it is very frustrating to sit out at Cataraqui until I am watching other people curl.

Watch for information concerning the Queen's Curling Club's second annual intercollegiate bonspiel, coming up in March.

Bews News

Comm '76 in 1st place

Paul Findlay

We are now in the midst of a busy Bews term. All the team sports are underway. All the tournament sports with the exception of Free Throw have started. Free Throw entries close next Wednesday. The cross-country skiing meet is next Monday evening. There are a record 34 entries in the event.

In early Basketball results: Comm '79 37, Meds 28; Mining 33, Arts '76 20; Comm '77 37, Law '78 16; Education 43, Comm '76 18; PHE 51, Elect. 29; Arts '77 by default over Law '76, Education 69, Arts '77 33; Civil-Math 29, Mechanical 21; Law '77 55, Arts '76 31; Meds 37, Arts '78 17; Arts '79 32, Bus. Grads 19; Science '79 35, Chem 28; PHE 45, Law '78 20; Mining 32, A & S Grads 11. It seems that the strong basketball teams are Education, PHE, Law '77 and Mining.

In Bowling, Law '77, the defending champs, were on top of both the Tuesday and Thursday leagues.

In Curling, Civil-Math 11, Meds 6; Bus. Grads 11, Comm '77 6; Arts '78 8, Law '77 5; PHE 8, Mech. 5; Arts '77 9, Comm '78 4; Comm '76 12, Law '78 1; Comm '79 6, Arts '76 5; Law '77 4, Science '79 3; Bus. Grads 7, Arts '78 3; Mining 9, Law '76 2; Meds and Law '78 both by default over Arts '79.

Speaking of defaults (notice how I changed the subject so smoothly?) there have been too many of them in Waterpolo. In 12 games, there have been 7 defaults involving 6 different teams. The Convenor has asked that all teams make an effort to get enough people out to avoid defaults. It is unfair for the other team who shows up to deprive them of the opportunity to play. Also your teams loses points in the bews standings.

Now that we are on the topic of Bews standings (that's the 2nd smooth transition for those of you who are counting) they have been updated with the addition of Basketball entry points. Thus there is little change in the positions. Most point totals have just been increased by 2,000 points: Comm '76 has broken the 40,000 point mark and retains its 1,400 point lead over Arts '77. PHE is less than 500 points behind them. Well back is Comm '77. The next five teams are separated by only 1,700 points. The standing are:

1.	Comm '76	40082	13. Law '76	24141
2.	Arts '77	38640	14. Arts '78	23532
3.	PHE	38189	15. Comm '78	23477
4.	Comm '77	32546	16. Elect.	19781
5.	Civil-Math	30268	17. Chemical	19591
6.	Law '77	30036	18. Education	17602
7.	Arts '76	29581	19. Sc. '79	16561
8.	Bus Grads	29168	20. Comm '79	13963
9.	Mech.	28576	21. Arts '79	9866
10.	Mining	25662	22. A&S Grads	8478
11.	Meds	25395	23. Indep.	4692

If you expect to graduate on May 29, 1976 please come to the Arts and Science Faculty Office as soon as possible and check that your name is on the degree list.

Unless this is done you run the risk of your name being omitted from the final official list.

Valentines day on ice

Before you get your Valentines day completely planned (ie, February 14th for all of non celebrators, wall flowers etc.) keep in mind this exciting fact. On Saturday afternoon February 14th 1976 at 2:00 in the afternoon the 7th Annual Re-enactment of the original Hockey game will be played.

This historic, and memorable event will take place on the Harbour Ice.

The Hockey Weekend is to commence on Friday, February the 13th and will run until Sunday February the 15th 1976 including such activities as a big parade (to which the Queen's Bands have been invited), the big hockey game and other interesting events aimed at providing entertainment for young and old alike.

This game will be played by the Queen's Golden Gaels and the RMC Redmen. Be sure not to miss it! Further information may be obtained from Mr. Phil Quattrochi at 542-4996.

WIC-ly words

Gee-Gees play the spoilers

John Wilson

A team that is in a tight race for the play-offs can't afford to lose games that they should win easily. Yet this is exactly what the Gaels have managed to do twice in the last week. Last Wednesday they looked like the tiddly winks team in losing to RMC 5-2. Tuesday night they accomplised new heights of mediocrity in dropping 4-3 at the hands of the Ottawa Gee Gees.

Now Ottawa isn't all that bad of a team but man for man there is no way that they are as good as the Gaels which they have shown on two previous occasions. How is it that they came all the way from the Nation's Capital and humiliate us in our own rink? The only reason for this has to be the Gael's ineptitude and the Queen's side's ability to choke away easy points.

The Gaels fell behind for the first time at 15:54 of the first period when Brian Chambers batted in a puck which had bounced in frout of Camel Harris. The Gaels pulled even on Geoff Arnoldi's first goal of the night. However Pierre Guindon scored just under the buzzer to give the Gee Gees a 2-1 lead. The Gaels tied it up for the last time on a goal by Bill Van Camp early in the second but Henri Caouette put the Gee Gees ahead to stay a mere two minutes later. Caouette rnunded the score for Ottawa while Arnoldi scored his second for Queen's with a minute and a half remaining. The Gaels failed to tie it up at the end despite pulling Harris for a sixth attacker.

The Gaels' hopes for a play-off spot have dwindled severely. They now sit 6-6-0. U of T, the division leader is 8-3-0, York is 7-5-0 and Laurentian is breathing down our backs at 5-8-1, a meagre one point behind the Gaels. If our boys keep pulling stunts like all five men converging on loose pucks, like giving the puck away in our own end, like missing on passes when on the attack, they can kiss the play-offs good-bye.

dine

The Queen's Golden Gaels did not manage to take the lead in this important game at all. It was a great disappointment to all concerned. Hhere arnoldi scores with assists from Aubrey and Haramis.

The sickest part of our game remains to be breaking out of our end. We continue to merely rap it at the boards instead of having organized plays. As well Ottawa managed to get two breakaways against us which says something about the way the Gaels were playing the man Tuesday night.

Well the Gaels have to face the U of T Blues on the 30th and the 31st of January and that will tell a lot about our playoff chances. The remaining games include very few 'soft' ones so every contest from here on in will be important.

Summary

1st period
1 Ottawa: Chambers (Enright, Byers)....15.54
2 Queen's: Arnoldi (Aubrey, Haramis)...18.29

From the Sports desk...

Home:

This weekend there is not going to be a great deal of Intercollegiate action at home. In fact, there are exactly three big events which should attract the attention and support of Queen's crowd. On Friday in the Bartlett Gym the women are hosting a Tri-meet in Archery. The action promises to be fast and furious so come on out. On Saturday the Women's Volleyball team (?) is hosting a Co-ed Invitational. All those who are as curious as I am to see what this is all about--I'll see you there. In the Pool, the men will be hosting a Triangular Swim meet. Plattsburg, and McGill will be in attendance.

Away:

On Friday the Women and men hit the hills for another round of Alpine Skiing--this time at Collingwood in the Waterloo Invitational. Also on Friday the Women head for Toronto to Curl, and the Women's Ice Hockey team heads for McMaster to challenge them in a game which could go either way. Track and Field at York sees the women in action on Friday and then the men take over on Saturday and Sunday. Men's Fencing, Gymnastics, Squash, and Wrestling take place on Friday and Saturday at various locations. For gymnastics action, RMC is the place to head. The women will swim at Waterloo on Saturday and Sunday. Also on Sunday the men will play Badminton and Squash at the Wilfred Laurier Invitational.

Other Things:

The basketball teams and the men's hockey teams are not active this weekend. (On second thought they will probably be active but not in an official capacity.)

Comment: I feel great! This place was chaos tonight with Reynolds leaping around claiming triumph for OFS, Giles and Fred staying behind (1); cookies from Bels who has holed up with Nanc in the morgue Bob on his way out of town pretty soon - be sad to see him go; and I'd like to say that Anelle J Nicholson is one of the world's most wonderful people for tolerating such a rollen apt. mate xxx ooo. You're great, Nikki. Why doesn't the mighty McClelland rate a comment - all right ..no comment!

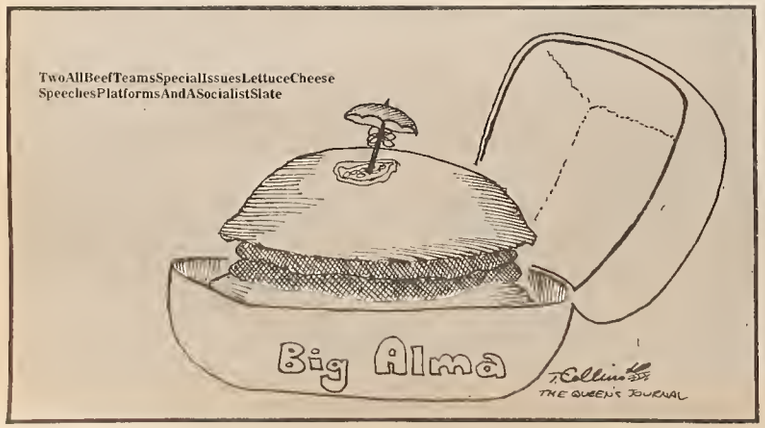
Look beyond your nose, OFS!

Dear Editors,

I am writing on the eve of the scheduled OFS rally in Toronto to "stop the Henderson Report" in an anticipated response to those who, in the likelihood of a relatively poor showing at the event by Queen's students, may place the blame for such an occurrence upon the total lack of concern at this campus for issues of purportedly broad interest to all students. I am asking that, for once, the leaders of both the OFS and the AMS look beyond their own noses and consider the Report of the Special Program Review Committee in regards to its intended aims and scope.

As stated in the terms of reference of the Committee, one of its purposes was to investigate "ways and means of restraining the costs of government", for it also recognized that "one of the consequences of increased government spending at current levels is that it fuels the very inflation governments are fighting". Chapter Seven of the report must be considered with this purpose in mind - it cannot be adequately appraised in isolation. I am sure that if I were to present Chapters Four and Five of the report (those dealing with cut-backs in the size of management and administration in the provincial government) in the same manner, those who are presently protesting the implications of Chapter Seven, calling for a halt to the implementation of the SPRC Report, would jump on the bandwagon and laud the government's sincere effort to fight the rising tide of inflation. Please consider all of the ramifications of the report and not only those which threaten the rather sheltered academic world in which we live.



To be sure, living within the changes proposed by the report over the next three to four years will be difficult, but any hardships incurred can only be considered as part of students' attempts to come to grips with double-digit inflation. Surely the reasoned acceptance of the report by individuals such as myself will be called elitist by the representatives of the OFS and others espousing their cause, but to strive toward universal accessibility at a time when the implementation of such an ideal might have potentially devastating effects upon the economy and society only serves to demonstrate the inability of the OFS to adequately deal with the problems faced by a university system which exists within the society and not outside of it.

It is not the purpose of this letter to argue the specifics of the Chapter, such as the implications of the proportions of public to private funding of universities and the transition from enrolment based to globally budgeted financing schemes, but I can ask the OFS to consider these actions in their dealings with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities in the future. In regard to the implementation of the McKeough-Henderson Report, the OFS should act to ensure:

1) that anticipated increases as recommended by the report will at the very least continue to present quality of education in Ontario universities and hoepfully will improve upon it, 2) that steps to alter the existing bursary programs to include real opportunities for those who cannot afford the increased fees be implemented in full force; 3) that changes in societal attitudes concerning post-secondary employment requirements be initiated by the government as proposed in the report, beginning first perhaps within the Provincial administration; 4) that the OFS itself direct its collective energies toward a more pressing and relevant criticism of the McKeough-Henderson Report, as a responsible reading of its full contents (especially Chapter Eight, on proposed health care cutbacks) would most certainly warrant.

To Mr. Lane and the representatives of the OFS, I can say only this: please be aware that, among that mass of apathetic irresponsibility, there are those of us who have certain intellectual capabilities, who are willing and able to use them responsibly, and who adamantly refuse to be led down the garden path (or to Queen's Park for that matter) by the OFS.

It is a rare and special privilege to be allowed every Friday to have your thoughts recorded on black and white newsprint, and then to have 10,000 copies printed, and sent out to unknown readers. The editors in their wisdom publish this column whether it be fact or fancy. The liberty that they allow continues to amaze us, and signified the responsibility of writing that they place on our shoulders. Often, we merely write to fill space, but occasionally there are thoughts which we feel are dynamic, and worthful. Having used a paragraph to say all this, we continue with a collection of ideas which reflect the philosophy that yes, oh twentieth century man, you are your brother's keeper.

The recent revelations at Port Hope Ontario that Eldorado Ltd. has turned the town into a nuclear nightmare are shocking and disgusting. The company has indicated that it has no legal responsibility for destroying the community. But surely they have a moral responsibility to the people whose homes are filled with radon gas, and who now for the sake of their lives must move. This debacle of nuclear technology gone wrong is an ugly scar on the Port Hope community and Eldorado Ltd. It was especially appalling to hear the Mayor talk of the bad publicity, and lower real estate values. Not once did he talk of the human problem. Where are we when real estate is more important than a human being?

The OFS admits that after the economic barriers to education have been eliminated, we still will not have achieved the goal of universal accessibility because the even greater social barrier remains. The unfortunate reality is that OFS wouldn't know what a social barrier looks like if it stared them in the face. We cannot in good conscience continue to ask for free tuition, and a living stipend until we have done our utmost for those who live in utter human deprivation. We owe to society a far greater debt than OFS has even considered.

And finally, consider what Prime Minister Trudeau has challenged this nation to do in terms of a fundamental value change. He is asking Canadian society to accept the social responsibility for the person we call our neighbour. That he would risk his Prime Ministership on this issue clearly says that we must thank him, in the very least, for making us think about our way of life. If there is to be stability in this nation, Canadians must, of necessity, begin to realize that our desire for more material possessions has to end. It is a challenge that we can face up to with the expectation of a brighter and more humanly fruitful tomorrow.

These thoughts for a Friday are dedicated to Robert Mumford, a man who understands the predicament of our times.

Phantom D's

Dear Editors,

What ever happened to freedom of belief at Queen's? For the past four months I have been victimized by a group of unknown individuals who refer to themselves as "the Phantom D. Society". A number of times I have found my door covered with "D's" ranging in composition from shaving cream to ink! I have also received at least 3 phone calls requesting, and sometimes demanding that I subscribe to the word of "D", whatever it may be! Isn't there some rule about fraternities and the like at Queen's? I know I am not the only one who has been subjected to this harrassment. I would greatly appreciate it if you could find out just what these nuts want and how they can be stopped!

McKeough: Time for priority setting, soul-searching

Ross Bartlett

"What I am saying, in essence, is that it's time for a bit of soul-searching and a lot of tough priority setting. It won't be easy: it won't win you any popularity contests, and it won't be fun. I can tell you that from personal experience."

The speaker was Darcy McKeough, Ontario's Provincial Treasurer and the occasion was a special meeting of municipal and school board representatives and officials from towns, cities and counties in this area, on the subject of financial restraint. A packed McArthur Auditorium listened to McKeough and Education Minister Thomas Wells call for help in financial restraint. Also in attendance were Donald Irvine, Provincial Secretary, Dennis Timbrell, Minister of Energy, Robert Welch, Minister of Culture and Recreation, James Auld, Treasury Board Chairman and McKeough's newly appointed Parliamentary Secretary, Keith Norton.

The Treasurer's seven-page brief outlined the basics for the Tory government's "operation Restraint". "We have come here today to ask for your help in a task that is simple enough to define, yet difficult to achieve: we must restrain the growth of government spending." While stressing that Ontario is "not on the brink of financial ruin," he insisted that the local governments must begin a "very tough exercise in fiscal restraint," one that is both "unpleasant" and "healthy as well."

Wells spoke in much the same vein: "We are at war with inflation. We mean to win. "There has been a shifting of responsibility he claimed, and "school boards are now full partners with us in the restraining process," adding that they were expected to do their part. Wells' fifteen page brief was more specifically directed at the individual educators. Both men called for an end to spending on frills, but, "No two people define the word "frill" in the same way," Wells hastened to add.

Neither made the task seem pleasant. "The challenge and responsibility is clear. It will not be easy. It will not win any of us personal accolades," stated Wells. The Treasurer claimed that what he was asking the officials at the meeting to do was "no more than what every taxpayer and every resident of Ontario has the right to expect."

Response to these calls was mixed. Some officials rose to commend the government's actions, but all had some complaint.

The angriest statement of the otherwise friendly meeting came from Peter Watson, Trustee for Frontenac Township. Demanding that the government realize that quality education costs money, that it stop using the education budget for costly research, stop giving patronage appointments and "useless" Royal Commissions (a direct reference to McKeough's recently completed one on financial constraints), Watson claimed that the government was "dismantling the education system."

An obviously upset Education Minister dismissed the remarks as part of a "left-over speech from the election." Wells demanded that "instead of listing the dire effects" of the policy, that Watson give him some things "we can do to fit into the guidelines of 10 percent as set by the Treasurer."

Question

Bartlett

The Journal asked Darcy McKeough about government reactions to the OFS rally in Toronto last week. McKeough was questioned during a press conference after the meeting of Provincial cabinet ministers held at McArthur Hall last Friday.

The Ontario Treasurer claimed that the Henderson Report was still in the "questioning stages" and answered that the government's answer "may not emerge as yes-no to all 184 resolutions." Some will be accepted -- some rejected, as was the tuition fee hike.

Watts to decide on Bus-it

Sarah Yarnell

Principal Ronald Watts has said that he intends to inform AMS President Ian Nordheimer in time for Thursday's Outer Council meeting of the amount of financial support the administration is willing to give Bus-it 1976-77.

Watts said Jan. 13 that the university would continue to fund Bus-it at what Watts interpreted the current level to be: $3 per full-time student.

In deciding this, Watts said he took into consideration the discussion in the Senate, the current financial situation, the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Student Affairs (SCOSA), and the AMS Financial Constraints Report.

Since that time, SCOSA has confirmed that it had urged the Principal to continue support of Bus-it at a level of 40 percent, not at the 1975-76 dollar level.

Watts told Nordheimer Jan. 15 that he was giving the matter "further consideration."

"To increase the subsidy would be difficult in the present financial situation," Watts said.

Watts said that he had asked Nordheimer for suggestions of budget areas where cuts could be made in order that Bus-it could be funded. Nordheimer said that he referred the Principal to the AMS report on Financial Constraint.

The Public Utilities Commission (PUC) has lowered their price for Bus-it from a total of $9.50 per student to $8.90 per student. Negotiations between the PUC and the AMS have now ended, and the AMS is waiting for an answer from the Principal.

All-candidates

Tonight, at 7:30 p.m., in Stirling 'D', there will be an AMS Executive All-Candidates Meeting.

Members of the Socialist slate, including Ross Sutherland (President), Brian Lawson (Vice-President, Operations) and Gale Blank (Vice-President, University Affairs), will be there, as will the slates of Jacmie Avis (President), Paul Steep (Vice President, Operations), Kathy Wood (Vice-President, University Affairs), and Cindi Hall (President), Bob Butterill (Vice-President, Operations), Ross Brown (Vice-President, University Affairs).

Interested students are urged to attend. The election will be held February 4 and 5, 1976.

The Journal confronted Queen's students with the following question: What are your views on financing the 1976 Olympic games scheduled to be held in Montreal this summer? Apparently, the province of Quebec, under the advice of the Bourassa government, had expressed desire to host the 1976 Olympics, thus accepting the financial responsibility involved with such a commitment. In lieu of alleged financial difficulties, questions are now being raised as to whether the proposed Olympic site will be completed in time for the Opening Day Ceremonies.

Sandra Burtch (Music '76) admitted, "I fail to see how Quebec alone can get out of its financial problem, but in principle, Quebec should really pay for the Olympics by itself." According to Sandra, the province of Quebec expressed a desire to host the Olympics in Montreal, in hopes it would not only benefit the city, but also all Quebeckers in general "The people of Quebec at first thought they could pay for it themselves, but now their expenditures appear to have gone over their heads." With respect to labour problems, which Sandra termed 'typical' for Quebec, the question of whether or not the Olympic facilities will be completed in time remains unanswered. "The Olympics is an important occurence," Sandra pointed out, expressing the belief that it will be beneficial for Canada to host the Games, since it will provide a chance for those all over the world to see what this country is really like; bringing Canada more into the limelight of an international audience. "However," Sandra noted, "if things do not go as planned the world will see Canada, not Quebec, as losing out in the end."

"I don't agree with the idea of Canada footing the bill of a project Montreal initially said it could finance itself", was Rob Stevens' (Geology '78) reply. Realizing the rising cost of inflation, Rob pointed out "each time the Games become more elaborate, getting farther away from their initial intentions," and added, "I can see a number of better ways that Montreal could have spent this money they have already placed into the Olympic venture." Rob suggested that Montreal should concern itself more with the social welfare of the city and deal in matters such as their smog treatment problem, for example. "I think it would really be a shame not to host the Olympics this year," Rob commented, "with all the money and planning already involved, and above all, the training each athlete has undergone just for this event." If worse comes to worst, the Canadian government will have no other choice but to step in and help Quebec's financial situation. "In the future," Rob forewarns, "costs should be more carefully considered in planning such important events."

Kathy Dunsmore (Law '77) perhaps exemplified the general attitude of those interviewed "After Expo, the people of Quebec should have known what they were undertaking, and realized when they were getting over their heads." In short, Kathy expressed the belief that since the province of Quebec has undertaken financial responsibility of the Olympic Games, it should carry out this venture as planned. Though Kathy feels that the federal government will not step in to aid in financing the Games, she believes that Quebec is merely calling a 'bluff' at the moment. "It is not feasible to pull the Olympics out of Canada after all the money that has gone into it," was Kathy's reply. Kathy appeared to be irritated with 'incompetence' on the part of provincial government, when she remarked, "they should have been able to take inflation into account." Internationally the 1976 Olympics cannot be seen as other than a 'Canadian' venture; therefore Kathy pointed out, "the fact that it is held in Quebec is not significant, for if it fails, it will be considered a failure of Canada as a whole."

UTC now defunct

Rob Reynolds

The University Travel Club has been forced to go out of business. The reason according to Berni Koch, Director of the Queen's Student Agencies, is because the company that the UTC arranged buses through, Reid Leasing Agencies, has folded.

As to what happens with the remainder of the Club's money, Koch stated that as the Club's constitution calls for, the money will be presented to Project Green. According to Murray O'Shea, President of the UTC, there is $35 remaining on the books of the UTC. The Club managed to generate the $35 through Club memberships and profit made on their trips. Memberships to the Club cost $1 and were taken out by 744 people.

The Club had an arrangement with Reid Leasing Co. to pay for the buses on a per student basis. As a result of this arrangement, on an $11.50 round-trip fare to Toronto, Reid Leasing was paid $11 and $.50 was returned to the UTC to pay for advertising, printing of tickets, office supplies and personnel expenses.

The man who operated Reid Leasing was Don McVie, a former Queen's student and head of last year's Excursion Club. Last year's Excursion Club met the same fate that this year's University Travel Club did; it ceased to function. Koch pointed out that the poor service of the Excursion Club was not the fault of McVie The inefficiency of last year's service was, according to Koch, the fault of the company that the Excursion Club dealt with. As Koch pointed out McVie had no control over when the buses left or the insurance arrangements of the carrier.

This year's University Travel Club was officially informed of the discontinuation of service by Reid Leasing on January 15, according to O'Shea. Koch stated that he was informed of the problems of Reid Leasing and the UTC on January 19th. Koch officially closed the Travel Club on January 22 after reviewing the particulars of the situation. Koch, however, pointed out that the service had been non-operational for 2 weeks before he was informed.

The matter will be raised at tomorrow's Outer Council meeting, if students would like to ask questions on the matter. The meeting will commence at 7:30 in the McLaughlin Room of the Students' Union.

Admissions:

Meds and Law

Betsy Greenlees

Does a quota exist in the faculties of Law and Medicine for the number of women admitted into first year in order to increase the number of women in these professions?

It is stated in the Calendar of the Faculty of Medicine that "gender is not considered in the selection process and there is no quota on the number of female applicants who will be admitted It is our belief that equal opportunities exist for male and female graduates in the practice of medicine."

What is considered, according to Dr. Dwight Einarson, Admissions Officer for the Faculty of Medicine, is personal data and scholastic achievement The personal evaluation includes letters of reference and an interview with the admissions officer or a group of faculty members. The interview is not weighted heavily in the assessment, as it is possible that the interviewer may get the wrong impression of the candidate from just the one meeting. Scholastic achievement includes marks attained in university and the results of the Medical College Admissions Test (MCAT), which all applicants are required to write.

In 1975, out of 2151 applicants, 75 were admitted to the faculty Of the 513 female applicants, 20 were admitted (26.6 percent of the faculty of Medicine's 1st year enrolment), a slight increase over 1974 Dr. Einarson said that he did not feel that there is any evidence that women are any different than men with respect to their qualifications for practicing medicine; the only reason there are fewer women in the field than men is that since medicine is traditionally a male-dominated field fewer women apply. But in the past 3 years, of the total number of applicants to the faculty of Medicine, a greater percentage of female applicants were admitted to the faculty (1975 - 3.9 percent; 1974 - 5.1 percent; 1973 - 6.1 percent) than male applicants (1975 - 3.4 percent, 1974 - 4.5 percent, 1973 - 4.8 percent).

"It is the policy of the Faculty of Law that no applicant for admission shall be denied admission on the basis of race, creed, colour, age, sex, marital status, ancestry or place of origin" states the faculty's calendar.

Miss Mary Alice Murray, Admissions Officer for the Faculty of Law, emphasized that there is no quota for women admitted into Law. Only the academic record and Law School Admissions Test (LSAT) results are considered for when determining who will be offered admission to the faculty. No interviews are conducted Due to the large number of applicants (approximately 2400 in 1975), the applicants are required to have a high average; only applicants with a 70 percent yearly average will be considered

In 1975, 152 applicants were admitted to the Faculty of Law Of those admitted to the faculty, 38 were female; which is 25 percent of the first year enrolment while 24.9 percent of the entire faculty is female Murray suggested that the gradual increase over the years of women admitted to the Faculty of Law, is due to a general awareness that the field of law is as easily accessible to women as it is to men.

Contemporary need for world religion

Submitted by Pam Ridgeway

In commemoration of World Religion Day (Jan. 18th) a talk was presented on 'The Contemporary Need for World Religion' in the McLaughlin Room. The speaker, Wes Huxtable, lives in Ottawa and is a member of the Baha'i faith. This world religion of Persian origin was founded by Baha'u'llah in 1863.

Huxtable outlined from a Baha'i perspective the evolutionary social development of mankind from loyalties centered around the family progressing to loyalties centered around the nation. Baha'u'llah is seen to have ushered in the age of mankind's maturity, proclaiming that the time has now come to make our vision world-embracing Huxtable spoke on Baha'u'llah's teachings of the essential oneness of all religions, explaining that Abraham, Moses, Buddha, Krishna, Christ and Mohammed all taught the same religious truth. Each messenger revealed that which was suited to the spiritual capacity and needs of the age in which each appeared The Baha'is see the messengers as progressively unfolding religious truth, with Baha'u'llah the most recent link in this chain of revelation.

Huxtable went on to explain the belief that Baha'u'llah's teachings provide both the spiritual and practical means through which a global civilization may be realized. Without ignoring the difficulties involved in reaching such a goal, the speaker emphasized the creative spirit infusing Baha'u'llah's teachings and the incredibly positive future Baha'is see unfolding for mankind.

The speaker also explained the workings of the Baha'i administration. It is one composed of elected local and national spiritual assemblies culminating with the Universal House of Justice which deals with Baha'i affairs of an international level.

Huxtable then described the Faith's protection from division. Baha'u'llah, at His death, appointed His son Abdul' Baha as Interpreter of the Teachings, who in turn left his grandson Shoghi Effendi with this responsibility. The interpretive aspect of the teachings was concluded with Shoghi Effendi's death in 1957, while the legislative aspect is now carried on by the Universal House of Justice.

An informal discussion followed the talk, in which Mr. Huxtable answered questions on further aspects of Baha'u'llah's teachings, including the Faith's relationship to other world organizations such as the U.N.

Anyone interested in learning more about the Baha'i faith is welcome to attend informal discussions which are held Wednesday nights, 8:00pm, at 373 Johnson Street, and Friday nights, 8:00pm at 129 Alfred Street.

"Who killed JFK?"

Nancy Watson

Mark Lane, appointed by Marguerite Oswald to defend her son before the courts and the Warner Commission, is flying here from Washington, D.C., to speak to Queen's students, on Tuesday, January 27th.

Time magazine has said of Lane that "he is one of the three most popular lecturers on the college campus." He is reputed to be the most dynamic investigator in the U.S.A. His presentation is so skilled and polished that it keeps the audience gasping with excitement.

Mark Lane is presently Director of the Citizens' Commission of Inquiry based in Washington D.C. This commission has demanded the release of all classified documents regarding the cover-up of the death of John Kennedy, and it will report to the standing committees of Congress, regarding the role of the F.B.I., C.I.A. and other federal police organizations in the cover-up. Lane teaches at the law school at the Catholic University of America in Washington D.C.

He is also author of six books, and has made two films; one a documentary, and the other a feature length film entitled "Executive Action."

The lecture on Tuesday evening will include a showing and analysis of the Zapruder film of the assassination. This lecture is sponsored by Artsci '79 and '78. There will be no charge for those with Arts '79 and '78 cards, and a cover charge of fifty cents for all others.

Don't miss "Who Killed John F. Kennedy?" Tuesday, January 27th, at 7:00 p.m. in Dunning Auditorium.

Snow sculpturing contest

The following are the rules for the Snowball Snow Sculpturing Contest for "Nogo Snec" this year.

1. You may build your sculpture anywhere on campus but preferably on the concrete malls. University Ave. Queen's Crescent, and Union St. are the best locations.
2 You must use your own tools and scaffolding. Groups should provide themselves with shovels, hoses, pliers for loosening taps, washers to prevent serious leaks, lumber and hammers, etc. Please do not leave lumber lying around or it will be removed by the groundsmen. Wood is allowed in the sculptures as Internal structural support only and must not be used for filling.
3 There are three themes for the sculptures--comic characters, the Olympics and inanimate objects.
4 Information regarding water supplies will be announced in the Journal.

The sculptures will be judged and a trophy will be awarded to the winner. Originality, quality and adherance to one of the three themes is stressed. Sculptures must be completed on Saturday January 24.

Any further questions can be answered by phoning Janet Pond, 544-8894.

HOUSING LOTTERY

Wednesday FEB. 4
(Final and for sure date)

GRANT HALL

Doors open
6-7
Draw at 7:15

Rules and procedure

1. The lottery establishes only a position on the waiting list. The number of units available of any size depends on the number of renewals. There is usually a 50 percent turnover. We will know which apartments and houses will be available on March 1, at which time you will be informed if you have a unit.
2. The lottery is open only to Queen's students who will be registered as full time students for the academic year 1976-1977. Pink cards must be presented at the lottery or at the AMS office by 5 pm Fri. Feb. 6 if a place on the list is obtained. You don't have to stay for the draw, but it is up to you to find out if your name is selected. A list of those names will be posted on the bulletin board outside the AMS office.
3. Each student is entitled to only one ballot, available at the door, which can be applied to only one type of dwelling unit. If two ballots are found in the same name both will be destroyed. However, if you are applying for a five-man house, for example, all five prospective tenants may apply. Bring your own pencil to sign ballot.
4. An individual whose name is drawn and who chooses to accept the dwelling must be a tenant of the unit, and must have his name on the lease (and be legally bound by the terms of the lease.)
5. Units leased through AMS Housing based on number of single bedrooms.

Minimum wage

OTTAWA--The recently announced new minimum age for employees in industries under federal jurisdiction will become effective April 1, 1976, Labour Minister John Munro announced today.

The minimum wage will go from $2.60 an hour to $2.90 an hour, while the minimum wage for employees under the age of 17 will be increased to $2.65 an hour from $2.35.

The present minimum wage has been in effect since July 23, 1975.

About 20,300 workers will be affected by the increase, which falls within the federal anti-inflation guidelines.

Senate news report

Nancy Bowes

"The Senate has not yet taken any official stand" on admission procedures for Secondary students affected by the Toronto teacher's strike, reminded Principal Watts at the January Senate meeting last Thursday.

The Principal's report was guarded. He informed Senate that the Director of the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) has begun talks with Toronto officials regarding how the lost time will be made up. COU is optimistic that the essential material can and will be covered.

ooooo

Principal Watts also reported the resignation of Jack MacDonald, Executive Director of COU. A search committee has been established to find a successor to MacDonald

ooooo

The Operations Review Committee submitted a notice of motion to Senate. At the February meeting, the Committee will move that any part-time student or part-time faculty member who has received a letter of appointment from the Principal be eligible for positions on Senate.

New History chairman

Principal Ronald Watts has announced the appointment of Dr. George Rawlyk as Chairman of the History Department beginning July 1, 1976, for a five year term.

Dr. Rawlyk has been at Queen's since 1966 after having taught at Mount Allison and Dalhousie. He holds a B.A from McMaster and a B.A and a Ph.D. from the University of Rochester. He was a Rhodes Scholar in 1957.

Dr. Rawlyk's major field is Canadian studies in which he has written numerous publications. He has served on many Queen's committees, among them the Senate Committee on Discipline and Related Matters.

Souvenirs

The Richardson Stadium

Terry Collins

Today's Mackintosh-Corry parking lot now occupies the former site of the George Richardson Memorial Stadium.

Opened in 1921, the original home of Queen's football was donated by James A. Richardson in memory of his brother George, a Captain with the Canadian Infantry during WWI. Graduating with a B.Sc. from Queen's in 1906, George Richardson was a distinguished athlete in his undergraduate days. Playing both hockey and football with outstanding sportsmanship, he was never penalized for any infraction of the rules. According to D.D. Calvin in his history of Queen's, "an old team-mate recalls that Richardson was once 'ruled off' during a hockey match in Ottawa. He stared at the referee in blank amazement but said nothing, and skated over to the penalty-box. Afterwards the referee apologized to him, acknoledging that he knew he had 'got the wrong man'". During the war, Richardson held the respect and devotion of all men under his command. He was a man of great generosity and once bought each member of his large squadron a pair of 'extra fine' boots. He was killed in action in 1916.

The stadium in his memory was designed by Dr. Malcolm of Queen's, and provided summer employment for many students. The first game played at the site took place on October 8, 1921 when Queen's beat Varsity 9-5 for its first win over Toronto in thirteen years. 3,500 screaming fans watched as 'Doc' Campbell scored the first touchdown in the new stadium. As reported in the Journal, "Campbell gathered in a kich of Harding's and, shaking off three Varsity tacklers, ran fifty yards for a touchdown between the posts." Principal Taylor later sent a letter to commend the athlete on his score.

The old stadium was home to seventeen intercollegiate champion football teams, three Dominion champs and one Grey Cup winner. Herb Hamilton of the Alumni Association wrote, "A good deal of the famed Queen's spirit was kindled at these football games. Guarding the goal posts against expected invaders from other colleges the night before the game became an integral part of student life, even if the promised invaders seldom materialized."

"..there was the memorable day in 1937 (when) Queen's played Varsity in the driving rain. At 12 noon there was twenty-six inches of water at the south end of the field and it was considered inadvisable to play the game. However, emergency sewers were opened, pumping engines from the Kingston Fire Department were brought into use, and most of the water was drained off by game time. There was only one fumble under these atrocious conditions. The final score: Queen's 3, Varsity 0. Johnny Munro kicked three singles."

The stadium housed many great events throughout its life including visits from President Roosevelt, the Governor General, and the Queen with Prince Philip. It also provided a home for Alfie Pierce.

Frank Tindall began his coaching career at Queen's in 1948. The great gridiron players of the 50's included Tip Logan, Harry Lampman, Jim Charters, Al Lenard and Ron Stewart, who went on to persue an outstanding career with the Ottawa Rough Riders. The finest years came in the sixties when the Gaels won five intercollegiate titles and placed second the other five years of that decade. The final game played in the old stadium took place on November 7., 1970 when Queen's won the Yates Cup beating Waterloo 20-6.

In 1971 a patch of turf from the old field was maved to the new stadium at West Campus. A bigger, more modern structure was badly needed to replace the old stadium. Some alumni felt, though, that the old stadium could never be replaced.

The Law and the Seabed Symposium

- tud

Dr. D. Crosby, director of the energy conservation branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources

Barb Nyland

Hidden at the bottom of the world's oceans are black particles, no larger than grapefruits, which are possibly a new and abundant source of many metals used by man today. The discovery of manganese nodules, containing manganese, copper, nickel and cobalt as well as other metals has created a serious debate among groups concerned with international resource allocation.

The Law and the Seabed Symposium held last week dealt with the touchy political and legal problems as well as the technical difficulties of extracting manganese nodules from international waters.

Manganese nodules were discovered over a hundred years ago but only in the past fifteen years has seious consideration been given to developing this resource said Dr. G Bartlett of Queen's Geology Department. In the 1960's it was estimated that 1½ trillion tons of the resource existed. The current estimate is 3 to 3½ million tons but Dave Pasho, head of the offshore minerals section of the Resource Management Branch of the Department of Energy Mines and Resources in Ottawa, admitted that no one is really certain about the true abundance of manganese nodules.

Manganese nodules are worth nothing without their development by industry stated Pasho. Both he and Dr. D. Crosby the director of the energy conservation branch of the Department of Energy Mines and Resources in Ottawa, emphasized that industries would have to receive a fair return on their investment and a major problem entails organizing the legal arrangements between industry and any international authority which might govern the resources.

The means of allocating this potentially very valuable resource, which exists in international waters, among the countries of the world, was a major consideration of the speakers.

Traditionally countries do not interfere with the prior appropriation of the sea resources stated Dr. G. Alexandrowicz of the Queen's Law Faculty. In 1966 the leader of the third world nations in the United Nations made the revolutionary proposal that the resources of the seabed, such as oil and manganese nodules, become "the common heritage of mankind" said Dr. Alexandrowicz. It was felt that the income from resources beyond national jurisdiction could be used to start an international organization which would govern them as well as a fund to aid underdeveloped countries.

Then according to Dr. Alexandrowicz "everybody got greedy". He stated that the proposal of a 200 mile limit to national jurisdiction excluded most of the petroleum resources from the heritage of mankind and "the last portion of this heritage is the manganese nodules".

Dr. Crosby later cut short his official presentation to counter Dr. Alexandrowicz's statements. "The ambition was to push Canada back to the shoreline." he said. Crosby feels that a coastal state has a responsibility to manage resources. "The coastal state has to have its interests and the interests of the dependent people at heart".

Dan Niosi, evaluation engineer of Noranda Mines Limited described the technical problems of mining the nodules. The ocean floor is not a smooth surface. "We will have to know where all the obstructions are before putting down mining equipment" he said. Among other things Noranda is interested in zirconium which could be obtained from the nodules as this can be used in making tubing for nuclear power plants Niosi stated.

Social anxiety

submitted by R. Lanthier

You are at a party and have just been introduced to an attractive guy-girl whom you would sincerely enjoy getting to know better, but your conversation goes nowhere because you are too shy to go beyond the small talk and let him-her know what you are really like. Later, at home, you realize that your shyness has deprived you of what could have been an enjoyable evening.

Or, have you ever felt that you wanted to get to know one of your classmates, who seemed like an interesting person, only to find that you lacked the self-confidence to strike up a conversation? Had you been a little bit more sure of yourself, you may have initiated a significant relationship.

Many of us feel this way from time to time, but for some, lack of self-confidence in social situations is a continuing source of annoyance and frustration. All too often, however, these people think that nothing can be done to increase their level of social self-confidence, and take a resigned attitude towards improvement ("That's the way I am and there is nothing that can be done to change it.")

This type of behaviour can be changed Currently an experiment is being carried out in the psychology department whose aim is to identify effective means of improving the level of one's social self-confidence. Preliminary studies indicate that the procedures used in the experiment should be effective in bringing about such a transformation

If you would like further details concerning this project, or feel that you would like to be a participant, please do not hesitate to contact the clinical secretary of the Psychology Department, Marg Innes, at 547-5915, weekdays from nine to twelve and from one to four-thirty.

Dance for Camp Outlook

Marie Maccagno

Some final words regarding Camp Outlook's Dance Marathon, being held Friday, January 30 in Grant Hall. The doors open at 8.00pm and will remain open til 8.00am Saturday morning. The scheduled musicians are as follows:

9:00-10:00pm - Fallen Angel

10:00-11:00pm - Roger and the Ramjets

12:00-1:00am - Queen's Jazz Ensemble

1:00-2:00am - Ralph O'Hara, a square dance caller from Belleville, who is bringing his own troupe.

2:30am-? - Paul Mingay, Gerry Bakker, Glenn Thompson, three folk musicians.

Talent from the crowd on hand may supply the music for those last early morning hours.

Pledge cards are still available in the John Orr Room, and extras will be available at the door for those last-minute decisions. Please remember to bring your Student Cards, pledge cards and small white cards to the dance.

Everyone is welcome to come, if not with a partner, then on your own. We encourage everyone to stay the full 12 hours, but it is not mandatory. Just be prepared to have a good time, possibly win one of the many prizes, and dance to your heart's content!

See you there!

On the house

On February 3, 1916, fire swept through Ottawa's Parliament Buildings leaving almost total destruction in its wake. On the 60th anniversary of that fire, Feb. 3, CBC Tuesday Night take a nostalgic look at the "new" House of Commons in a program called, This is On the House. The hour long program begins at 8.03 p.m. EST on CBC-AM; it will be repeated on CBC-FM's Encore, Sat. Feb. 7 at 4:03 p.m.

This reminiscent collage of the people, events and the new building that constitute Canada's House of Commons was prepared by Rick Butler, and co-produced by Fran Cutler in Ottawa and David McCormick in Winnipeg.

Among those who remember what it was like way back when are the Rt. Hon. John Diefenbaker, commenting on former Prime Ministers Robert Borden and Mackenzie King; J.W. Pickersgill on Mackenzie King; John Turner on Lester Pearson; and Tommy Douglas on Diefenbaker.

The golden age of parliamentary debate, the Prime Minister's secret staircase, barber shop harmony in the house, and Mackenzie King's spiritualism are all referred to in this fond appreciation of the House - then and now

Taxpayer's side

Dear Editors:
I am writing to comment on the recent furor over tuition fee increases. It should be noted that I am a recent graduate myself, and that my husband is presently a student at Queen's, so I would seem to be in a position to empathize with students.

On this issue, however, I find myself on the opposite side of the fence from most students As a taxpayer I have begun to see most university students as selfish, arrogant people who expect their every whim to be catered to

Are most students aware to what extent their education is currently subsidized by the government? Or do they naively suppose that their $680. covers all expenses?

In the present hard economic times, cutbacks in government spending have to be made - is it reasonable for students to suppose that they should be exempt from the financial difficulties everyone else is experiencing? Isn't it more fair to assume that they should share more of the economic burden for their education, seeing as they are the ones who benefit from it, not the taxpayer, who foots the bill?

The whole "accessibility" issue amuses me. Raising tuition fees will never keep a really determined person away from university - it may simply delay him a year or two. And it may have the positive effect of discouraging those people who attend university merely because they can't think of anything better to do from doing so.

Why is it that university students feel so hard done by? With all the holidays and grants and loans they receive, they have it a whole lot easier than a person like myself who earns $5,000. a year (and supports a husband on it) gets a few days off at Christmas, and in my particular case (I have two part-time jobs) is entitled to no vacation at all. I'm not complaining about my lot, I am just trying to point out that students don't have it as bad as they think.

The grant and loan system has to be a farce. An acquaintance of mine is going to Cuba for a week during the March break at McArthur, to the tune of $400. How can she afford it? She received a substantial loan. Another friend and his wife are off to Europe next summer for 12 weeks, thanks to a huge grant. Another friend received $2,300, 1,450, of which was pure grant. And his wife is a teacher!

How is it that my husband and I get by on $5,000 a year, with no financial assistance, while these other people milk the taxpayer for holidays to Cuba and the like? If these are the ones who need financial assistance, then I'm not too concerned about university accessibility. Evidently we have already attained that goal, and now we are just throwing money away to the students in order that they can afford cars and expensive holidays.

No, folks, I won't shed tears for the students if tuition fees are raised. It will indicate to me that the government has finally opened its eyes.

Book solution

Dear Editors,
I was interested in Glen Farley's letter in the January 20th Journal. Exposure of such book-hogs as number 140-9011 is surely less than they deserve. Perhaps if enough students supported the idea, some method of limiting an individual from taking out more than two books of the same number or perhaps in the same range of numbers (ie no more than two books within ten, numerically) might be devised. I realize this might be an expensive feature for the library to include as part of their computer services, but if the regulation were made I'm sure the library could count on the students themselves to report their disappointment after scanning the circulation lists.

Right now books are subject to recall after two weeks and are held for the requesters. This new rule would allow for the immediate recall of books held by offending users over and above the limits stated in the rule.

It also occurs to me that two books might be too much of a restriction in some cases, and not restrictive enough in others. In that case, perhaps another feature of the card catalogue entry might be some notice such as "Users are allowed only X number of books in this category at one time", determined by the number of books available. This would be a service that only the library could perform at the cost of some manhours. If enough students are attracted to the idea, however, perhaps the AMS, which has recently increased its support to athletics, might look into the possibility of partially funding such a student-oriented library service?

ASSERT YOURSELF NOW!

The Student Counselling Service is offering a programme in assertive training. This programme is intended for individuals who have difficulty either in expressing their wishes and feelings or who assert themselves in inappropriate ways. The programme will begin, Wed. evening, Feb. 4 and will be held each Wednesday evening for the following 4 weeks (with a break for reading week). Training will be provided in small groups and participants will be expected to complete homework assignments and engage in a variety of exercises. These exercises include modelling, behaviorial rehearsal and video tape feedback. If you are interested in the programme, contact Frances before Jan. 23 at the Counselling Service, 32 Queen's Crescent, to arrange for a preliminary interview. Phone 547-2893.

The candidates on OFS..

Hall, Butterill Brown

Cindi Hall

Giles Gherson

Supporting the OFS as a "well-developed bargaining unit with the provincial government, Cindi Hall emphasized that such support entails consideration of the needs of society as a whole."

In terms of specific policy, Hall's team endorses the OFS aims for free tuition, increased government grants and a living stipend as long term policy. For as Butterill stated, "free tuition and a living stipend are 'idealistic' now due to financial conditions; we have to consider that there are other people in this province who need the dollars, perhaps more than we do". In the short term Hall's team opposes any tuition increases.

Hall, a member of the OFS Policy Advisory Committee, also calls for a revision of the Ontario Student Loan Programme. In this regard she has three specific proposals. First, she considers that the age of independence should be lowered to eighteen, the age of majority. Second, Hall favours the "elimination of the parental contribution" aspect of the loan scheme. This would place greater emphasis on the student and his summer earnings in that the independent wealth of the student would be the prime basis for eligibility for a loan. Hall also seeks a more flexible scheme that would take into account such aspects as where an individual student lives and the student's job prospects. Third, Hall wants "greater support for special cases," for example part time and graduate students. Such groups need support "but are unable to find it through the existing process". Hall also noted that the government has not used its allocated budget for OSAP thereby suggesting that there is scope for extending the programme.

Hal maintains that Queen's input into the OFS "has been handled efficiently this year" and seeks to "maintain the quality" of this input by such means as ensuring that the recently formed Policy Advisory Committee has representation from all Faculty Societies. Ross Brown also suggested that the quality of Queen's input into the OFS depends to a large extent on the calibre of the External Affairs Commissioner and the OFS delegate. Stating that the "most important thing we can do is to provide responisble input into the OFS", Hall dismissed the question as to whether she wished to field a candidate for the OFS executive, as "premature". She did claim, though, that this would be something she personally "would like to see."

When asked about her view on the OFS policy of closer integration with the National Union of Students (NUS), Hall contended that any commitment to that body "will demand a lot of careful attention." She stressed the relative importance of OFS and noted that most of the funding of universities was now at the provincial, rather than federal level.

Hall's team voiced concern over the housing situation at Queen's. They stressed the necessity of long term planning as a step towards improved student housing. Hall also claimed that "the tenant-landlord review programme set up by Queen's Legal Aid deserves the financial and technical assistance of the AMS." Such technical assistance would include an attempt to anticipate growth patterns using the Outer Council researcher and other existing facilities. Hall also promised the establishment of a "special task force" consisting of student representatives, members of the student body at large, and professional advisers to survey the situation. She stated also that she plans to work closely with Campus Planning, the Queen's Housing Service, the university administration and especially municipal government in an effort to tackle the problem.

Avis, Steep, Wood

Jamie Avis

Giles Gherson

Claiming that "we are for a really strong student movement," Paul Steep thus summarized the main thrust of the Avis team's support for the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). The team endorsed the main policies of the OFS although it expressed considerable concern that the strength of the student movement was liable to be mitigated if the OFS continued to display a desire "to build a hardline OFS-worker coalition". Steep claimed that such a desire was evident at the OFS mass rally in Toronto last Wednesday. He charged that such a policy on the part of the OFS had never been discussed in Outer Council. Steep stated that he, "doesn't think we should support this". He feels that not only is labour strong and very well organized, unlike students, but that on the whole "students' ideals are not easily identified with those of labour". He contended that often a conflict of interest situation can arise when students support an interest group such as labour. "If we support labour in their battles for higher wages, then students will have to pay more " "Special interest groups such as labour and the communist party will want to support us, but we shouldn't be put in a position where we have to buy their whole social programme", stated Steep. Avis fully endorsed Steep's viewpoint claiming "in my view they're (interest groups) trying to use students for their own interest". Steep did acknowledge that there are certain issues in which the concerns of labour and those of student are compatible - the McKeough Report for example

Kathy Wood criticised the OFS for continually being on the defensive rather than proposing ideas to the government.

The Avis team is seeking more Queen's input into the OFS, and in this regard they are keen that a Queen's OFS delegate should secure a seat on the OFS Executive.Wood also suggested that Queen's do more OFS research, an undertaking which she claims would prove "a valuable experience for students here" and benefit OFS at the same time.

In terms of the policies of OFS, the Avis team endorsed free tuition, in Wood's words "as a means to an end, the end being universal accessibility", in other words the ability of those unable to afford but those who are sufficiently qualified, to attend.

Universal accessibility is the goal behind the OFS policy of increasing government grants while phasing out the loan system Wood referred to the policy as "a nice idea" but felt that it could be more moderate in terms of replacing loans by grants. While Avis recognized that the problem with loans is that "people don't like to get into deep debt". He suggested that a "more flexible loan repayment scheme" would lose their disincentive aspect. Wood considered that this flexibility could be achieved through the institution of loan banks or a "parallel aid system" which would entail a contingency repayment loan scheme not tied to parental income. In this sense the Avis team considers a drop in the age of indepdencence to 18 a "a step in the right direction".

Wood also claimed that the government could ease some of the criticism of its loan program by making it more efficient. Specifically, she said that students should be made more aware of the appeal procedure for obtaining a loan. She also claimed the Government might be adivsed to establish a better high school, liaison on the subject of student loans for the purpose of informing students fully of the program before they get to university. "It's one thing to have a good system and another to have good knowledge" she said.

Essentially the Avis team considers that "OSAP needs to be made more flexible and needs to conform more to people's needs." Avis emphasized that one has "to keep in mind that government isn't going to come out with enough money" and thus the necessity of enduring that "those who need it get it, rather than those who don't"

The Socialist Slate

Giles Gherson

The Socialist Slate said that the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) should broaden its base and "co-ordinate its efforts with those of other groups trying to effect social change." Siding with the Ontario Fedcration of Labour was cited as one example. The socialists said they feel that whereas "students and labour are in no way groups that traditionally work together well in society," their struggles for social change are similar. The group also sees a connection between the fight against wage and price controls and the fight for free tuition. "We ought to support labour," they said.

The socialists appear to find themselves basically in agreement with OFS policy. They endorse the OFS goal of free tuition and a living stipend to achieve universal accessibility to university, but consider this a "long term goal" which must be considered within the context of social change as a whole, "not at the expense of hospitals" and many other government funded institutions and programmes.

For the moment, the socialists claim to actively oppose higher tuitions, which they claim would "extend the elite status of universities "

The group said that they doubted society would accept policies such as free tuition until a large degree of "social reorganization" had taken place. "Free tuition would only be acceptaibe to society if society were different from what it is today." They stressed that they did not want free tuition for free tuition's sake, but as part of a larger social change.

In order to work toward these goals, the socialists said that they consider it necessary that "students become aware of social issues," and "develop a social perspective." They suggested that a type of "political orientation" as opposed to a "management type of orientation" could be achieved by means such as establishing a department of women's studies at Queen's, and by offerlig courses in "non-profit economics "

The Socialist Slate said that "since we want to start new values, it is hard to be specific." They added, "If we found ourselves in office .. when we find ourselves in office, we would do whatever necessary to mobilize our platform."

"It would depend on the students at Queen's how far we went," they said

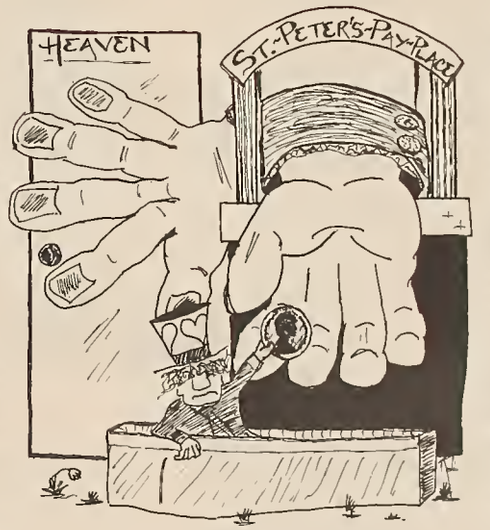
Live now, pay later



Peter B. Raabe

The consumer price index rose 14.7 percent on services from October, 1974 to October, 1975, according to the Statistics Canada "Statistical Canadian Review."

Cost of shelters over the same period rose 10 percent. In real terms, this means that the average single room dwelling is now renting at approximately $1,000 for a 12 month term, the average one bedroom apartment in Kingston now rents for about $1,700 per annum.

In terms of the increase on the price of dwellings over the last two years, one might be led to conclude that this same rate of increase may occur this year as well.

When one combines the costs of housing with the cost of services, and adds the cost of sustenance to the figure, the total increase in the actual cost of staying alive becomes tremendous.

- woody

Death, like talk, is cheap

In a comparison study, it was found that dying would be the most economical way to live. This study did not include the costs of cremation, or the expenditure on the actual means of death (natural death being the most costly due to the time factor involved in most cases.)

Neither was the price of sustenance included in the cost of living figure, for the time period involved would be strictly speculative.

The repetitive nature of the price of renting or paying for a dwelling plus the added expenses of maintenance were the deciding factors in establishing the most economical means of being. When prospective tenants or buyers look at a dwelling, they fail to keep in mind the costs of electricity, telephone, oil, taxes and repairs to their future residents.

One has only to take a superficial glance at a funeral to realise that these expenses are never encountered by the owners. Funerals are a so-called one-shot deal. The price of the dwelling is finite, to the point of infinity, the residents in the property needing to feel no apprehensions regarding new yearly rental contracts with buried clauses. Though owner interviews are rare, (they do exist) it is generally assumed that there are few if any tenant-landlord squabbles.

The proprietor of a respected local funeral home said that the most convenient form of funeral is the "conventional funeral" type of arrangement. These may range in price, at this establishment, from as little as $395 to $1,595. The average funeral, arranged for by most Kingston clientel, is the $1,195 package, which is all inclusive, except for newspaper notices, limousine, cemetery charges, and the outer coffin shell. The shell may consist of a rough box, which is, as the name implies, an unfinished pine box sold for $75; the cement liner, selling at $100; and the cement vault, an air-tight, water-tight cement box and lid, for $195. The coffin is placed within these, which are usually already in the earth at the time of interment.

Home entertainment package

A complete funeral package includes such items as a hearse, the minister's car, the removal of the body from its place of death, embalming (replacing the blood with a preservative fluid, since a body deteriorates very rapidly from within the first three days of death), casketing, flower arranging, registration and certification that the corpse is indeed deceased, thank-you cards, use of the funeral home, chapel and other related facilities, and helpful extras like coffee in the guest area, and a guest book giving the names of those who visited the deceased to the next of kin.

There are many things an individual may not want in such a package deal and various items may be deleted, as the client desires.

In choosing the method used by many out of town funeral homes, called "functional pricing", that is pricing individual items separately, one may incur a higher total expenditure as a result.

A most economical funeral may be constructed as follows:

The grave site, $100 maximum, choosing the nicest view and neighbourhood offered at this price.

Interment, or digging fees, $65.

Removal of body from the place of death, $20.

Coffin, consisting of the rough box only, making sure it is well constructed and with a minimum of knot holes, $75.

Transportation to cemetery is $25.

Optional items one may want, and can employ while still keeping costs down are such things as having the funeral home do the work of locating the doctor to get his medical statement and certification of death, and the registration of the death at city hall, for $20, using their lowering device to put the coffin into the grave instead of your own, for a charge of $50 which includes turf to cover up the ground over the coffin; riding in one of the home's limousines for $20; and announcing the death in the paper for an approximate cost of $10 per day.

Just pinin' away

Making one's own pine box is another way to save, but various cemeteries will not allow a funeral to take place with the deceased encased only in a rough box. A memorial, to mark the spot of the deceased's residence, usually costs from $600 up, so it is more prudent to do without.

In comparing these prices to those of other funeral homes in the city, they are among the lowest.

"Lower prices are available elsewhere, of course," said the proprietor, "but the surroundings in the funeral home reflect the inexpensive prices they charge."

The cost of dying has paralleled the cost of living almost exactly, funeral costs having risen approximately 10 percent over last year's prices.

"This is due to the increase in the cost of merchandise, overhead and labour."

The funeral director was asked if some funeral homes would not take advantage of people buying these items and services, and overcharge or pressure sell their wares on people in a state of low resistance.

"No homes in Kingston would take advantage of their clients, and our prices are among the best in the city, the most expensive deal we can offer is the one at $1,595, which includes everything. There have been people who have bought copper caskets at $6,000, but not in Kingston We have only ever had one family who bought a funeral out of guilt, and therefore bought the most expensive of everything we offered. Usually people are fairly realistic about these things."

He spoke of the package deals as being the most humane, in that they saved the client the "nit-picking one has to do in assimilating the individual's items in the funeral, such as paying for the use of the home by the hour and so on, which one finds in the "functional services."

He added, "people who think that funeral services cost from $4,000 and up, are always surprised when they hear the price of the best we offer."

Rent-a-tomb (Cheap!)

The price of dying, although increasing from year to year at a comparable rate to the cost of living increases, is very low in Kingston. This city offers some of the most beautiful funeral homes as well as some of the of the most enchanting cemeteries in Ontario.

The time to die is now, before the next price rise is brought on by the living. After the initial expenses of the funeral, the only further investment made is the one by next of kin to the upkeep of the property. Fuel costs are non-existent, as are telephone and electrical services charges. Add to these figures the cost of sustenance for the deceased which is zero, and one arrives at the perfect answer to combating the high cost of living. It is far more expensive to build a wooden structure to live in than it is to build a wooden structure to die in.

Predictions are, that there will soon be speculation in the field of dying much in the same way it exists in the realm of real estate. Because of publications such as "the Book of James" by Susie Smith, and various other revelations about the state of existence after life, funeral prices may skyrocket, due to the increase in the demand to attain a more economical way of existence. Costs of materials and services may climb at a rate far in excess of the cost of living increases The back-lash from the rash of people dying, trying to attain funerals before the speculative price hikes, may result in a government-supported cut in the price of living. One may also expect the House of Commons to introduce a bill into the legislature making it illegal to die before a natural span of life, most likely set around figures produced by Statistics Canada in conjunction with the major Canadian insurance firms.

Dying now will reduce the chances of an individual's getting caught in the prices brought on by the possible future speculation Government intervention in dying seems to be the only reasonable solution

Arts festival 1976

For one week at Queen's the Arts are given a chance to come out of their closets and get campus-wide exposure. This is when many student artists get their chance to display their works.

It is an event which is sorely neglected by the campus at large. Attendance was good at such events as the folk singing, but was non-existent at other events. At a university one would think that students would welcome the opportunity to broaden their horizons.

Unfortunately, Arts Festival is not given the big buildup that homecoming and Wanderlust receive. Perhaps if there was an Arts Festival Formal...

This years festival lasted a week, and was the biggest yet, so that there now seems to be a future for an event which had almost died through student apathy.

James Cotton Blues Band

John Chittick

In keeping with this year's policy at artist diversification, the AMS concert committee is proud to present the James Cotton Blues Band. One of your higher energy groups; this band can positively melt an audience. The Cotton Band is an assemblage of competent musicians who individually wouldn't win any awards, but together provide a showcase for the harmonica-vocals of the Man. And the Man; whether James Cotton wails wildly on his harmonica or cries out a rough-hued vocal, the sound is all the raw-edged urgent soul of Chicago blues.

James Cotton holds the best possible blues pedigree. Having run away from his sharecropping home, James met and was schooled in mouth-harp playing by the legendary Sonny Boy Williamson. His heartfelt playing was later disciplined by electric blues man Muddy Waters. James' present sound combines the feelings of his youth with a little slick big-city soul for icing.

Truthfully, Cotton can play harmonica like no other man. He can make it growl funkily, sing, swing, wail or soothe. Each sound contains the compressed energy of a plaintive, soulful choir of human voices His harmonica sound is like this smiling man himself: big, black, and beautiful.

While many bands have dropped their 'blues' designation, Cotton's band emphasizes it. They are proud of the fact that their music spawned today's music scene. Furthermore they are not about to switch musical notes to sell records. The James Cotton Blues Band is professional and this is evident in concert. As James says, "Even if I don't make the big one, I want to be considered a great entertainer without taking a back seat to anyone." Five years ago in Kingston, the Edgar Winter Group sorrowfully found that out.

End your Snowball Week listening to a man and a band that entertain. Be at Grant Hall on Sunday, February 1st. Tickets ar $4.00 and are available in the John Orr Room.

Mom's Menu

Eat your greens

Your Mother

Although the main part of most of our meals is some kind of a meat dish, this does not mean that the accompanying vegetables just have to be boiled and served. There are many recipes for dressing up vegetables, and a whole meal may consist of just vegetables as well. This not only allows for variety but is also less expensive than serving meat every night.

To change the flavour of canned peas, beans and carrots, drain the vegetables but retain just enough liquid so they won't burn when cooking. Mince a little bit of onion and add to the vegetables as well as a tablespoon of margarine while they are heating. Or to freshen the flavour of these vegetables, squeeze some lemon juice over them before serving. This will aslo help to rejuvenate the taste of leftover vegetables.

Cheese Sauce (makes 1 cup)

Cauliflower, broccoli or boiled cabbage will not taste bland if you make up a cheese sauce to be served with them. In a double-boiler, melt 3 tbsp. margarine and stir in 3 tbsp. flour, ½ tsp. salt and a dash of pepper. Quickly pour in 1 cup of milk, stirring constantly until of desired thickness. Grate ½ cup of cheese and melt in the sauce. Keep the sauce hot until serving to prevent it from solidifying.

Scalloped Potatoes (Preparation time - 1½ hours, serves 6)

6-7 medium potatoes
3 tbsp. butter or margarine
3 tbsp. flour
1 tsp. salt
dash pepper
2 cups milk
¼ cup chopped onion
dash paprika
grated cheese

Wash and peel potatoes; slice thinly. Spread about 1-3 of potatoes in a buttered 1½ quart casserole. Melt butter in sauce pan; slowly blend in flour, salt and pepper. Quickly add milk, stirring constantly. Sprinkle potatoes with half of the onions and 1-3 of the sauce. Cover with another layer of potatoes and remaining onions. Place remaining potatoes on top, then cover with remaining sauce. Sprinkle with paprika and grated cheese, if desired. Bake, uncovered at 375 degrees for 1 hour or until done and potatoes are lightly browned on top.

Salads taste best with a freshly made dressing tossed with the salad just before serving. All of the regular store-bought varieties of dressings can be home made in five to ten minutes. A basic oil and vinegar dressing is the best to start out with. This recipe may be altered any number of ways to change the flavour of the whole salad. As long as the ratio of 2 parts oil to 1 part each of vinegar and lemon juice is kept, you just have to use your own judgement on the amount of spices added to create a new dressing

Oil-Vinegar Salad Dressing

2 tbsp. oil
1 tbsp. vinegar
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ tsp. salt ⅛ tsp. garlic powder
⅛ tsp. pepper ¼ tsp. onion powder
¼ tsp. celery seed ¼ tsp. paprika

Mix all ingredients together in a jar with a tight-fitting lid. Shake and pour over salad. Toss salad

A Canadian Masterpiece

Tom MacGregor

when taking a thematic approach to Canadian literature, one of the more prevalent themes is that of the protagonist with the misguided vision. There is no finer example than Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz which has been turned into one of the finest English Canadian films made. Ted Kotcheff's film will be at Dunning Thursday night.

The energy of the story lies in the taking of the stereo-typed money-seeking Jew and showing him as a human. Richler put strong emphasis on Duddy's home life so we can see there is a very natural need for him to prove himself to his yarn-spinning father and favoured older brother. But to Duddy being a somebody means being rich.

It takes rare talent to consistently present a likeable figure whom we hate nearly everything about. Kotcheff found a perfect match to the challenge in Richard Dreyfus of American Graffitti and Jaws fame. An equal challenge is met by Michele Lanctot as the character the audience identifies with most. She plays Yvette the beautiful Quebecoise who loves Duddy but knows she can't close her eyes forever.

This love-hate contridiction is integrated into the whole presentation of the film. The audience laughs along with Duddy as he pulls off some schemes that W.C. Fields would take his hat off to. At the same time this is no comedy. As we watch such admirable family qualities start to stray off the path of acceptability or see the lingering emotion after love can no longer be possible, we realize how caught up in the story we are.

The strong controversy over the film is certainly not its quality but whether it is a Canadian film with American stars or an American film shot in Canada? If the latter is true then why did it do so well in Canada but fail so utterly in the U.S.? It seems this film says something Canadians can identify with. This is no tale about the American Dream; this is a film about man who wants something desperately but has guessed wrong what that is.

Up until now the Cineguild has presented us with an unfair amount of American films but this Thursday gives a chance to see something Canadian as well as one of the best films presented so far.

What Love is this

Chronicles XXXII presents What Love, two plays performed for your enjoyment. First is Sandra, directed by Goeff Swift, the story of a slave in a futuristic society. In her struggle for equality, the man she loves is the man who owns her, so how free can she really be? The second is Death and the Devil, directed by Ralph Peter. A woman's clash with the proprietor of a house of pleasure is the battleground over which total sexual freedom and conventional morality are discussed.

The production runs from Wednesday, Jan 28 to Saturday the 31, at 7:30 P.M. in room 102, Theological Hall. Tickets are available at the Drama desk in Theological Hall, or by calling 547-6291. There will be a silver collection.

Jazz at its best

Ted Simonett

Undoubtedly jazz is at its best in concert. Some music suffers by concert appearances, but not jazz. Jazz needs the space of the concert hall so it can gain momentum and cook properly. Jazz, in its conception, is largely improvisationary, and needs the sense of immediacy of the concert performance to give its sound life and freshness. Almost all music evokes some sort of emotional response. The gut reaction of a captive audience is an integral part of the jazz chemistry, and is another reason the concert performance is crucial in the appreciation of this musical idiom.

Last Tuesday night at the Grand Theatre, jazz buffs had a chance to get into some heavy appreciating as Woody Herman's Young Thundering Herd played with all the vitality and spontaneity that the capacity crowd could have hoped for.

Their programme was varied, including styles ranging from a medly of Duke Ellington swing (Satin Doll, Don't Get Around Much Anymore) to Chic Corea's contemporary jazz (La Fiesta and Spain). They soothed us with Michell Legrands "What Are You Doing The Rest Of Your Life?" and knocked us over with Al Broadbent's "Reunion At Newport", written specially for the Newport Jazz Festival.

Each of their fifteen numbers displayed rock-solid sectional strength, and some mind boggling solo virtuosity.

The horn sections were predictably strong - the brass-crisp, powerful and precise, the reeds with a uniform sound in whatever style they were blowing whether it be swing or pop, mellow or biting

However, the most exciting part of the Herman ensemble is its rhythm section. Bands can have great horn sections like this one does, but without a tight rhythm section to kick the beat along the horn players might as well blow their noses.

Lyle Mays on keyboard, Herbie Stewart on bass and Steve Houghlar on drums are three guys who work together extremely well. They are the newest addition to the Herd, Herman having picked all three of them up at the end of last summer from the North Texas State Jazz Band. He admits that in all his years of leading bands, they are one of the finest rhythm sections he has ever worked with. Flawless drumming, dextrous bass playing, plus a truly inspired keyboard performance made experiencing this rhythm section something akin to spending an evening in Nirvana.

Solo efforts such as Jim Pyle's trombone lead in "What Are You Doing The Rest Of Your Life" deserves mention for the mellow magic it floated out over the entranced audience.

And Frank Tibieri's tenor sax work in tunes such as "The Four Brothers", "Reunion At Newport", and "Caledonia" was consistently slick and melodically interesting.

The list of soloists goes on, but suffice to say there was never a dull moment.

As the programme came to a screaming finale with "McArthur Park" the excitement the 15 piece Herd had generated among the 800 onlookers makes it obvious why the concert performance is so important. Not many people would leap to their feet and applaud a good stereo system even though the music they just finished devouring was worthy of the ovation. You have to go a little nuts after two hours of intensely exciting music. That release of sincere appreciation makes you feel good, and we left that theatre fulfilled after an evening of mind-blowing jazz.

S. Chaikin as Clytemnestra; T. Shepard as Electra

symons

McArthur murder

Queen's University Department of Drama, in association with St. Lawrence College Department of Theatre Arts proudly presents Joseph Chaikin's production of ELECTRA.

In creating this contemporary version of the Electra legend, Chikin has collaborated with poet Robert Montgomery, whose play SUBJECT TO FITS was the hit of the recent off-Broadway season.

In a naked arena, shorn of all inessentials, Chaikin has tapped the root of this most primal family drama. Electra and her exiled brother Orestes kill their mother, Clytemnestra, in order to revenge her killing of their father, Agamemnon, fifteen years before. They play examines the identity crisis caused by this violent act and explores the transformation which the human soul undergoes when subjected to the irreversible acts necessitated by obedience to absolute values.

Joseph Chaikin has contributed more to and had greater impact on the New York Theatre than anyone in the past decade with the possible exception of Joseph Papp. Obie award winning actor (for Galy Gay in Brecht's Man is Man). Toni award winning director (for America Hurrah), founder of the Open Theatre, and member of the original Living Theatre, Chaikin is generally acknowledged to be New York's foremost experimental director.

Men swam and dove against McGill and Plattsburg on Saturday in the triangular meet. The swimmers won 49-45 against Plattsburg and 51-43 against McGill. The divers from Queen's didn't really stand a chance against the expert diving of both of these teams and the final score was 57-51 McGill against Queen's and 53-50 Plattsburg against Queen's.

Away:

Women and men both won in Alpine Skiing in Collingwood over the weekend. The Women curled at Toronto and beat all three teams entered (Trent, Toronto and McGill). They advance to the Ontario finals February 13. The Ice Hockey Gals did poorly losing to Mac 6-3 and tying Guelph 8-8.

The Gaels and Gals in track and field performed well individually at York making and breaking new records. Men's gymnastics placed 3rd of three at an RMC Gymnastics Invitational (there is a great lack of experience on that team)--however Queen's rookie Ron Robinson took first place all-round.

In wrestling Mike Dwhytie place first in the 167 lb. category.

Alpine ski strong; win two so far

Both the Men's and Women's Alpine ski teams are starting their seasons strongly, having each won the first two competitions they have taken part in. Their first encounter at the RMC Invitational held at Calabogie Peak on January 17th showed their skilful ability. The two strongest Queen's performing were Bruce Cummings, placing 2nd in the men's race, and Jane McGillvray, placing 2nd in the women's. Both Jane and Bruce placed second to ex National Ski team members, Gord Acton and Diane Pratt.

This past weekend the teams were at Blue Mountain in Collingwood for the Waterloo Invitational. The victorious teams were again led by Cummings who took 4th spot, and McGillvray, placing 2nd.

Unfortunately the excellent weekend (snow-wise and placing wise) was marred by an injury to Robin McLeod who dislocated her shoulder. Until Robin is back on the snow, the girls will be suffering a big loss. With five races left in the season, the Queen's skiers are hoping to keep up their winning ways.

Doug Christie takes the slopes at Collingwood this past weekend. Queen's has been doing exceptionally well this year – hopefully they will follow in the footsteps of last year's winning team.

Triangular meet

Queen's swim to lead: diving weak

John Ireland

Saturday's double-dual meet against McGill and Plattsburgh State constituted one of the most exciting meets seen at Queen's this year. For the pool Gaels, torn with internal and administrative problems during the first few weeks of January, the meet was encouraging despite the ultimate heart-break - both meets were lost on the final relay. In all fairness to the swimmers, it must be pointed out that they won both meets, edging out Plattsburgh State 49-45 and clipping McGill 51-43. Unfortunately and through no fault of their own, the divers came up against strong and experienced divers from both opponents, which settled the load firmly on the shoulders of the freestyle relay team in the last event of the day.

Despite a valiant effort, Cassidy, Ripley, Ireland and Pearson could not quite close the gap against two 'stacked' McGill and Plattsburgh teams. Thus the final scores were McGill 57, Queen's 51 and Plattsburgh 53, Queen's 50. If the ultimate salvation of victory was denied Queen's, there were however privileged moments. A convalescent Tim Dennis proved unbeatable despite the handicap of a healing appendix scar, winning the 200 I.M., the 200 Breast and combining with team-mate Bruce Ripley to sweep the 200 Back with a 1-2 finish. The 'vet' squad of Ireland and Pearson provided 1-2 punch in the 200 fly (with semi-respectable times!) and combined with Dennis and Ripley to comfortably take the 400 Medley Relay event.

There were other personal triumphs. Wayne Scebrin established a personal best in the 200 I.M. 'Tex' Cassidy picked up a third in the exhausting 1000 freestyle. Mention must be made of John Schneldermann's effort to take third place in the 200 breast although he was finally nosed out on the touch. Freestylers Schnittker and Demmers gave their events everything they had as always, although Leo Hwozdyk was sorely missed, in short, nobody could fault the Gaels on team effort. In two weeks time McGill will return the favour when they host Queen's in a dual meet. Revenge will be sweet.

More immediately the swimmers face a busy weekend coming up as they will send an eight-man squad to an Ottawa U Invitational on Friday night. The following day will find the team at York while the divers attend an invitational at U of T. Meanwhile the OUAA championships are less than a month away.

The Queen's 5th Annual fnvitational Tournament was held Saturday, January 17 The visiting teams were U. of T. and McMaster, who both came with large teams consisting of 23 and 10 members respectively, while Queen's had only 8 members. So our girls each had to compete in many events. As the day progressed, Toronto pulled ahead to take 1st place in the overall standings with Queen's capturing second place and McMaster finishing last.

Placing first for Queen's in Junior Ladies Pairs were Jan McGillivray and Johanna Flipsen. Jan also came first in Junior Singles, while Marilyn Snell won Intermediate Singles and Ladies Open Dance fn the two interpretive events, second place finishers were Pattie Skirokoff in Junior and Vicky Cleworth in Senior. Two other second places were gained for Queen's with Marilyn Snell and Pattie Skirokoff skating in the Senior Similar Pairs event, and Debbie Johnson in the Novice Singles.

Larry Bencze, the only male member of the team, helped to capture third place with Julia Ringma in Novice Mixed Dance and Marilyn Snell in Junior Mixed Dance. His hard work and dedication became evident in the close finishes of these two events. Also placing third were Johanna Flipsen in Junior Singles, Pattie Skirokoff in Intermediate Singles and Vicky Cleworth in Senior Singles.

Wrestling

Z. Scarfarelli

A small contingent of Queen's wrestlers competed in the prestigious Guelph Open tournament this past weekend and came up with their best performance of the year. Wrestler-coach Mike Dwhytie led the Gaels with a first place finish in the 167 lb. weight class. There were 21 competitors at this weight. Ron Craddock, Doug Swerbrick and Al Stewart all wrestled well for Queen's, finishing with one win and one loss each at their respective weights.

Del Demonte had an unlucky draw and lost to a former Russian national champion, now at Lakehead University, in his first match. The tournament was well attended as always. Wrestling under the glare of television lights, Dwhytie defeated a University of Western Ontario opponent in the final match to win the title at 167 lbs.

Coach Dwhytie now hopes to be able to field a more complete team this coming weekend in Toronto.

In my opinion

f saw an event on Friday night which stirs me to write this article. f hesitate to write it. After all, who the hell am f, and who the hell cares what I think. However, because there seem to be so many nasty things being said and done I decided that because I had something nice to say (for a change)–f would take the time and effort to say it.

This article was going to start off–'For many years now I have looked upon the AMS Constables with about as much respect as f look upon the cheerleaders.....' but f decided that that wouldn't be a very nice thing to say about the cheerleaders so f refrained. fnstead this article starts off..

For many years now I know that quite a few people (myself included) have questioned the role of the AMS Constabulary System at Queen's University. fn many aspects they, as an institution seemed to have outlived their usefulness.

fn all truthfulness f have been skeptical, indeed cynical about the very existence of these elite students in little white armbands.

Let us leave the AMS Constable system for a minute and focus in on a Folk Concert which was being held Friday night in the International Centre. Many Queen's artists performed and the evening ended with Stan Rogers and his band from Nova Scotia playing some good old foot-stomping music mixed with some fine ballads.

Just after the end of their first set they were interrupted by the wild hand-waving of some drunken, bearded youth. The band leader, attempting to carry on some semblance of dignity asked this idiot what he wanted. They reply,—'Who do you think you are?'. I think every single person in that room at that instant was mortified. And embarassed. The performer attempted civility by pointing out that he had not thought of this question in philosophical terms lately. After some further exchanges the folk band continued their performance. They were interrupted after their next song also. Further abusive questions ensued. The performers continued. In the middle of their next song this talented and enjoyable band was further interrupted by the loud clattering of the aforementioned ignoramous banging some utensil on the wall and table (not in time to the music) and wildly waving about his arms.

ft was at this time that some defender of justice dashed upstairs to call upon the services of several steadfast AMS constables. ft was to the relief of many Queen's students that his disrupter was dragged from the scene. (ft was probably this quick exit which saved the life of this jerk–as several Queen's students were just coming to their feet to take action themselves). The situation took on just a touch of iron when as a final blow, the crowd was subjected to the loud cries of 'Freedom! freedom! ' as the disrupter was bodily removed from the Union.

To these constables, thank-you. To the system itself, f can finally say that f am glad you were there when we needed you. f think the situation would have been tremendously worse if the AMS constables had not come to the rescue. A CROWN to them for their conduct.

Hockey Gaels fall in overtime at Troy fn an exhibition contest at Troy, New York on Saturday the Gaels lost to R.P.f (Renfaeller Polytechnical Institute) in overtime 4 to 3. It was an exciting, well-played contest before an enthusiastic crowd of 4,000 fans.

The game was a see-saw battle with the score being tied at 2 after the first period and the teams added a goal apiece in the second twenty minutes. The third period was scoreless setting the stage for the Gaels' second sudden death overtime game of the season. However, the fate which befell them in their Dutch Cup victory was not to be repeated at Troy. R.P.f 's Serra scored 3 min. and 38 seconds into extra time on a hotly disputed goal. The Gaels argued to no avail that Camel Harris had held onto the initial shot long enough to gain a whistle but after a seemingly endless amount of time the puck came loose and the Gaels came home losers.

Jack, Beauclaire, and Hahn scored in regulation time for R P.I. Dale Sandles scored twice for the Gaels as their third line finally came to lift. Mike Haramis scored the Gaels' first goal on an assist from Geoff Arnoldi, the Blue and Gold's hardworking rookie centre.

Gaels made the trip without Grills, Van Camp and Harrington but they will all be back for the Gaels' big weekend matches against the Varsity Blues on Friday night and Saturday afternoon at Jock Harty Arena This will be the Gaels' biggest test to date and an overflow crowd is expected so get there early and cheer the Gaels back into contention for first place.

Gymnastics

Rookie stars

Queen's Men's Gymnastics team had its first meet of the year on Saturday in the Bartlett Gym Not only was it Queen's first meet, but it was also the first competition ever for most members of the team Almost everyone exhibited a bad case of the "first meet jitters." This should clear up with experience as routines are firmed up in the next few weeks.

A particularly strong performance was turned in by first year man Ron Robinson, who placed first all around Coach Archibald is looking to Robinson to reach the Nationals individually. Bob Smallwood, in his first meet, took third in the vault event.

All members of the team show great promise, and as soon as they get a few more meets under their belts, the team should go places. Archibald is predicting the team will make the Ontario finals in February. Right now, inexperience is the biggest problem which the team faces.

bellomley

Rookie, Ron Robinson, steals the show at the meet Saturday. He won the all-round honours and looks good for the future.

Indoor track

On Saturday, in the first Ontario university meet of the indoor season, a smallish Queen's team had a chance to size up the competition that they are likely to face in the finals.

R looks as if Lynn Andrews and Anne MacMillan will soon be joining the illustrious ranks of the sub-5-minute metric milers. Lynn chased Anne to a fine 5:01.2 in the women's 1500 m. Lynne's time was 15:01.3, a personal best. Anne broke the Queen's record that she had just set two weeks ago.

Mike Forsayeth managed 5th place in the high jump with a jump of 1m85.

Kathy Cook lopped more time off in the women's 400m. with a run of 1:04.6. Team-mate Laurin MacWilliam was right behind in 1:04.7.

Marc Macaulay and Jim Best placed 10th and 11th respectively, in a field of 34 400m. runners.

Laurin MacWilliam was 5th in a women's 50m. final that included speedsters Marg Stride (nee McGowan) and Sue Summers.

Duncan Card took 1st place in the men's 50m final.

Paul Spence managed a commendable 3rd place finish in the 800m. Jeff Giles was 2 tenths of a second behind Paul.

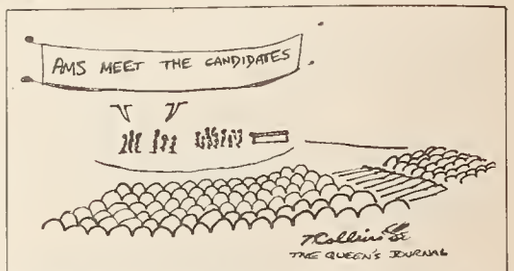
Claus Rinne had the misfortune of running in the slow section of the 5000m. where he absolutely outclassed the field, finishing almost a full minute ahead of the next runner. Team-mates Ian Gale, Mike deGuida and Max Barr ran in the fast section. fan Gale missed 6th spot hy 1 tenth of a second, finishing in a time of 15:19.

fn the women's 4 x 200m. relay, Queen's entered an A team and a B team, the latter comprised of 4 middle distance runners. The teams finished 4th and 5th respectively. The men held onto their 1st place of the year before in the 4 x 600m. relay.

Next week, some of the team members will be in Toronto for the Star Games Trials. The others will be travelling to Western to check out the new track (with an eye on the finals) in the London open.

Curl away

The Curling Gals are on their way to a successful season, as was indicated this past weekend when they won the Eastern Sectionals held in Toronto The Women's team, consisting of skip Sheryl Keely, vice Helen McCrae, 2nd Rhonda Sullivan, and Lead Sue Morrison, handily defeated all opposition. Scores were as follows:



Queen's vs. Trent 9-8.
Queen's vs. Toronto 16-5
Queen's vs. McGill 8-3

The curlers now look forward to their final games, to be held in London on February 13 and 14, and if they keep up the good work, will emerge as the Ontario Champions

Put back the funds in the Theatre fund

It has recently been disclosed that in 1972 some $32,000 raised by Queen's students and held in trust by the AMS were transferred by the University Administration into a University Centre Account, an action that violated the AMS constitution. It has also been revealed that the AMS failed to follow up on a plebiscite shelved "temporarily" by the Board of Trustees in 1966. These are typical examples of the ineptness of the AMS when it comes to defending student interests and representing the student body in front of the University Administration. (See Journal story Queen's art centre... in Queen's Journal, Friday, January 23, 1976).

It is unfortunate that although the present AMS executive had relatively little to do with the violation, they are the ones to come under fire; "the sins of the father are passed to the son" and they are the only ones at present in any position to rectify the problem. The present executive, particularly the V.P. (Operations) should see that all in their power, and more, is done to ensure the return of the funds, and accrued interest and the re-instatement of the Queen's Theatre Building Fund Committee. The various slates running for the executive positions should force the present executive to clear up this mess so that they in turn do not inherit it. If AMS President Ian Nordheimer refuses to take a stand that defends the student body as well as the AMS constitution, and allows the transfer to go unchecked, regardless of how long ago it was done, the candidates must make their stand clear to the students so that everyone can see whether their interests would be protected by the aspirants, should a similar situation arise again.

Well, I guess we might as well get started. Hello, I'm Cindi Hall, this is Bob Butterill and Ross Brown. And you must be...?
Nice to meet you. I'm Jamie Avis, this is Kathy Wood and Paul Steep. Have you met the Socialists?...

Crowns and Thorns

A CROWN to the AMS constables who hauled a rude, ignorant, and drunk student out of the Folk Concert in International Centre Friday night.

A CROWN to people who shovel their sidewalks...

A THORN to people who don't.

A CROWN to the Arts Festival Committee for making the effort which resulted in a very successful event.

A CROWN to the Snow–which finally arrived for Snowball week after 6 years of waiting.

A CROWN to Queen's University for endeavouring to save money by a 'save energy' drive which results in less lighting and heating.

A THORN for implementing this action during the coldest week Kingston has had in a century.

MSS supports AMS Bus-it stand

Dear Editors,

I would like to comment on your front-page article regarding Bus-It and on the administration's decision to restrict the university's contribution to that service to $3.00 per student. On behalf of the McArthur Student Society I would like to state that I agree with the A.M.S. in their opinion of the decision as both unfair and unacceptable. The students at West Campus would greatly suffer from this new policy. At a time when there has been much effort into alleviating the allienation which exists between Main Campus and West Campus, this decision by the administration seems to be particularly ill-timed and inexpedient.

Protest against Socialist tactics

Dear Editor,

I would like to protest the abhorant conduct of the Socialist Slate in the A.M.S. campaign by its attempting to drag in all the old tired political issues that have nothing whatsoever to do with our university elections. The Socialist Slates' refusal to give an exciting, spontaneous and newsworthy interview to the Journal and instead to insist on a dull, considered and slanderous analysis of our society is totally obnoxious, and shows their lack of competitive spirit and refusal to play the game.

On the other hand the exciting contest that is developing between the real candidates (Hall vs Avis) over the real issues (more exciting concerts and better pubs) give me confidence that with their emphasis on strong student government we can look forward to an even more prestigious and privileged university. At this point it is difficult to choose between the exciting promises offered by the real candidates as to who will get the most for us. Both sets of reat candidates insist on the necessity of maintaining Queen's intellectual prowess, and its good to see the candidates bringing this vital student issue to the fore whilst campaigning in the Clark Hall Pub and Disco in a manner befitting professional politicians.

The Socialist Slate has refused to engage in politiking in the pubs and has instead stooped to political pamphleteering and face to face dialogue. My analysis is that the Socialist Slates tactics will not be profitable, and that we will elect one or other of the real candidates that we richly deserve.

Housing rewards.. a viciuos cycle

Dear Editors:

I am writing this letter because the relatively recent trend of offering rewards for house finding really bugs me. The main point is to realize that those students who take part in this practice show a lack of sensitivity and respect for their fellow students. The problem is that many students do not fully realize the consequences of such actions.

Primarily, this practice begins a very vicious cycle. This clycle is begun by students offering rewards for houses. Then it is continued by those same students who expect this money to be returned by other students moving into their house when they move out. As a result, this phenomenon has gone from cash offered to cash demanded. In time the practice of asking "finders fees" will become more and more common until it is expected of all students.

At this point, a second problem comes to mind. What about those students who can't afford to pay out money for these "finders fees"? This may not be a very large problem now but what happens when the average demand or offer changes from $100 per house to $100 per person?! Not many people can afford a trend like this.

One last point to remember before you hand that money over to eager hands promising a house in return; it is the landlord who makes the final decision as to who is his house's next inhabitant(s).

Maybe I am a majority of one in believing that housing rewards offered or demanded should be stopped - but somehow I don't think so. Comments are welcome.

In a move to conserve energy, Principal Ronald Watts announced phase II of the energy saving program to be implemented immediately. Dr Watts has decided to install enormous fans and ducts from the AMS office to conduct heat. "We'll save thousands," commented Watts as he greased the bolts on a huge blower. "I plan to put this one beside John Wilson's desk."

Candidates debate the issues

Rob Reynolds

The all-candidates meeting on Tuesday night managed to draw approximately one hundred students. The three teams running for the executive of the AMS were present, and after briefly outlining their platforms, answered questions from the audience.

Roy Charles a member of Socialist Slate sitting in the audience, directing his questions to Paul Steep, candidate for Vice-President (operations) asked Steep to clarify his position on the question of student support of organized labour. In an interview in Tuesday's Journal, Steep stated, "student ideas are not easily identified with labour".

Steep replied that the statement in the Journal had been in reference to the OFS rally in Toronto where CUPE local 1222 was present, protesting about their contract negotiations with the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) at U of T. Steep said that the issue of CUPE 1222 at the rally "divided students when they were united on the issue of the Henderson Report."

Kathy Wood, candidate for Vice-President (University Affairs) on the Avis-Steep-Wood team, was asked by Stu MacLeod why she supported a Student Tenants' Association and how she intended to get people united and committed. Wood suggested that with more information students would realize that "they are being forced to pay exorbitant fees". Wood pointed out that students at U of T encountered similar problems and as a result, started a Tenants' Association in the academic year 1969-1970. Wood hoped that a comparable association could be started at Queen's.

Neil Ford, a member of the Socialist Slate, then asked Jamie Avis to clarify his team's support for the athletic program at Queen's. Ford was concerned that only Inter-collegiate teams would benefit if the Avis team was elected. Avis stated that he considered both Intramural and Inter-collegiate activities to be important in the University. Avis explained that he would have to look at the figure closely before he could give an exact answer or disbursement of funds.

John Beal asked what the AMS would do to help graduates find jobs, stating that upon graduation he was unable to find employment. Beal also asked the candidates to explain why he should help put students through school after his own graduation.

Cindi Hall, candidate for President on the Hall-Butterill-Brown team, replied that in order to aid graduates in finding jobs, Career Planning and Placement Services should be strengthened. In response to the question of why help put students through university, Hall stated that "the education process is important to society."

Jamie Avis interjected in response to the first question, saying the he was not convinced that the role of the University was to act as a job training centre.

Ross Sutherland voiced the Socialist Slate's response by saying that students should ask, "What should we do to change the society so that you can get a job?"

Rosemary Helmer took exception to Avis' response and pointed out that "Career Planning and Placement should be selling Queen's graduates from all faculties." Avis said he agreed entirely with her statement but that his concern had been that courses should not be geared solely to finding jobs.

Brian Lawson, candidate for Vice-President (Operations) for the Socialist Slate, said that he could understand Ms. Helmer's concern. Lawson suggested that students "must take a look at the economy" and that "corporations just don't need you anymore."

Brian Young, treasurer for ASUS and recently acclaimed Vice-President of ASUS for '76-'77, asked the Hall and Avis teams if they are working within an ideological framework as is the Socialist Slate.

Avis replied that he did not like Young's term "ideological framework" and that as he defined it, his team was not operating in such a framework. Avis said that he saw students as a special interest group in society and that student government must be flexible so as to represent those interests.

Hall pointed out that her team did have a philosophical view-point. Hall explained that increased awareness of society is the philosophy of her team.

Harry Binks raised the question of the consequences for Bus-it if the students defeat the referendum pertaining to increased participation in the scheme. Bob Butterill stated that the whole problem of students having to go to referenda every year is a result of the University's hesitation to make a "long-term decision" on the scheme.

Paul Steep stated that if the Bus-it referendum were defeated "there is no way you will see a comparable bus system" operated by the University or the AMS. Steep remarked that the University could not afford to run such an operation as the deficit of the PUC far exceeds the assets of the AMS.

Outgoing ASUS President, Bob Atkinson, asked how the parties would maintain the quality of education and how exactly they would make their input. Ross Brown, candidate for Vice-President (University Affairs) said that some input must come from the Senate but that the AMS would have input into the Senate. As Brown remarked about the AMS, "Without us, this University is nothing."

Kathy Wood explained that input can be made through informal channels and that those channels must be used. Wood also stated that her team favoured the Scottish System whereby room is made for individuals good at researching but not at teaching.

Bill Burgess of the Socialist Slate stated that the "most important thing is what we learn here." Burgess suggested that the structure of academic studies be altered and that more socially pertinent courses, such as womens' studies, be offered.

In relation to the status of women at the University, Susan Stewart of the Socialist Slate asked what the team would do about the problem of unequal treatment of women faculty and students.

Ross Sutherland remarked that working for change in the University must be brought into the perspective of "working for change in the society." Sutherland cited the example of women working in local textile mills as an injustice against women which students should take interest in.

Cindi Hall recommended that the Womens' Centre be given more support and that a close liaison be established between the Queen's Womens' Centre and the Kingston Womens' Centre. Hall also suggested that there be more women, on search committees to look for people, preferably women, to fill positions such as Deanships.

Avis pointed out that the case of equal rights and equal pay for women should not just be considered in the University but in the society. Avis noted that any infringement on women's rights is "unjust and unjustifiable."

Money money money

"It's great, I really still can't believe it."

That was the reaction of Philip Tomsett, third year Queen's commerce student of questions as to how he felt after winning $100,000 in Monday night's Olympic Lottery draw.

Tomsett has very few plans for the money, "which is already in the bank." His immediate action upon hearing of his win was to "keep checking the number in the paper", after which he called "his parents and his brother and sister."

He plans "to invest it maybe, and buy a few things. Maybe a car but nothing big for now."

Mark Lane revealed many startling facts to an intrigued audience Tuesday night.

Lane: JFK affair full of deceit

Tim Greenwood

"The seven members of the Warren Commission are accessories after the fact in the murder of John F. Kennedy," declared Mark Lane last Tuesday in Dunning Auditorium.

The dynamic and highly popular lecturer spoke before an overflowing auditorium on the Kennedy assassination. The eampaign manager for Kennedy during the 1960 presidential election and lawyer for Lee Harvey Oswald told the audience "my elient is now truth."

Lane was out to disturb the complacency of any who believed the conclusions drawn by the Warren Commission. He felt the commission had attacked the question under "the prism of preconception" that Oswald was the lone assassin, and ignored all conflicting evidence.

Lane presented information that threw the commission's conclusions into doubt, if not disrepute.

He spoke of the mysterious connections of Oswald with the FBI and CIA, and of Jack Ruby's ties with the FBI.

Oswald, Lane related, delivered a letter to the Dallas branch of the FBI two weeks before the assassination, and was on their payroll when he allegedly shot Kennedy and when he himself was shot. As well, Oswald associated with two contract men from the CfA for a length of time.

Jack Ruby, a known member of the underworld, worked for the FBI as well, Lane revealed. Apparently he was also a good friend of the Dallas police department

The gun that was supposedly singly responsible for the assassination of Kennedy also presented problems, Lane related. It was a clumsy and ineffective weapon incapable of firing fast enough to match the evidence. It was a gun that ftaly felt was responsible for their losing the war, yet the Warren Commission believed it to be the lone murder weapon.

An Olympic champion marksman noted that he could not have hit Kennedy with the gun supposedly used that day, to which Gerry Ford, a member of the Warren Commission, sharply inquired "that guy, isn't he a foreigner?" Lane told an amused audience.

Lane showed the famous Zapruder film which seemed to be visual proof of the inaceuracy of the commission's conelusion. Kennedy's head was seen propelled backward in his seat apparently from the bullet's impact when a bullet coming from where Oswald was allegedly stationed would have sent him in the opposite direction.

The Commission and the media which were responsible for creating "a Disneyland world" created "a magic bullet theory" to match their story, Lane told the audience. He explained the path the bullet would have had to have taken, involving U-Turns, if one were to believe the Commission.

Lane presented so much convineing evidence that it was impossible to accept the conclusions reached by the Warren Commission.

He explained further how the assassin's bullets that struck Kennedy were the "first shots fired in the massive Vietnam war" since Kennedy was planning to withdraw troops.

Bobby Kennedy was shot after revealing that if he reached the presidency, he would "blow the lid off the case", according to Lane. Bobby told of premonitions of his fate when he said, "There are guns betwcen me and the White House."

After holding the audience spellbound for four hours, Lane showed his film, "The Rush to Judgement," which underlined what he had spoken of before. Witness after witness in the film said they felt the fatal bullets had not come from where Oswald was but from a "grassy knoll" and witnesses were seen that we later learned met violent ends.

No solid conclusions were reached Tuesday night, but the audience left with troubling questions gnawing at their minds.

Must change our attitudes in order to survive

karen becksted

Due to unforeseen circumstances, Dr. A.Z. Arthur was unable to appear at Tuesday's Future of Man Lecture Series. Dr. Reg Clark, co-ordinator of Queen's Nature, Science and Man courses, was asked to speak as a replacement.

Though completely unprepared as a result of short notice, Dr. Clark stimulated an interesting discussion. Dr. Clark feels that the biggest problem confronting the world in the present day may turn out to be our attitude of defeatism.

"We can get uptight about too many things." According to Dr. Clark it is a necessity that we decide which problems are caused by mankind and which of these are potentially solvable.

Dr. Clark mentioned the population explosion, the energy crisis, racism, the possibility of climatic changes, the thinning of the ozone layer and the increasing disparities between rich and poor as problems of great magnitude which we are currently facing. However, Dr. Clark does not feel that these diffieulties will destroy us. "We will kill ourselves by indifference or trying to point the finger of blame, instead of trying to do something positive."

Dr. Clark believes that a change of attitude is a prerequisite for our survival. North Americans were not born to inherit the earth, and he feels that we must be prepared for our standard of living to decline. We should blame neither politicians nor industry but accept it as a consequence of our past actions. Dr. Clark stated that the attitudinal change of the world's population would only take 7.9 years due to exponential growth. This is based upon the assumption that it would take one individual 3 months to convince another to adopt a different viewpoint.

Dr. Clark is convinced that this is the age of great effect upon attitudinal change. A member of the audience mentioned the striking example of the province of Quebec; it suddenly experienced a decline in its birth rate so that it now has the lowest, instead of the highest, birth rate in Canada.

When challenged about this new "age of the individual" Dr. Clark conceded that it was partially an escape device. He agreed that the state cannot be an initiator until the people want it to be, that the church is no longer primary, and that the educational system is geared to social stability rather than social change. Hence he believes that the individual has to be paramount in developing attitudinal change.

The discussion closed with the question: "are we our brother's keeper?" Dr. Clark suggested that we should give aid to the under-developed countries to prevent ourselves from becoming completely self-centred and uncaring. However, we should not kid ourselves: "we can't perform miracles."

Dr. Clark believes that many mistakes have been made in past aid programmes; in the future more attention should be paid to the traditional methods used by the Third World. Technology is not our saviour, according to Dr. Clark, but it can help us if we ask it to do the right things. (He cited miracle grains in comparison with space exploration as an example.)

For those interested, Dr A.Z. Arthur will be on campus February 24th.

Give a pint, win a cup!

This coming Blood Drive on February 3rd, 4th and 5th will feature an interfaculty competition for the maximum percentage of participation in the Blood Donor Clinic. We are urging all years to gather their members together for an all out drive for blood. Last clinic, though we had the highest number of pints donated, the donation only represented 10 percent of Queen's University. I think that each person as a human being owes a certain responsibility to his fellow man, after all, you never know when you might be the one receiving.

Your donation at the Blood Donor Clinic next week will be serving two purposes, the first, as a gift of life, and secondly, as a part of your year's contention for the Corpuscle Cup. In 1963, Meds. '69 had a 98.6 percent participation, Queen's as a university had 23 percent participation. Can you match this?

Take the time next week to show that you care about your fellow man and for your year. For those of you who wish to help with the clinic, we need people to assist the nurses and serve refreshments. A time-table is posted at the front desk of Victoria Hall where you can sign up for a convenient one-hour slot. If there are any questions, please contact me, Paula Luck, at 544-5972.

Engineering bursary won

The Simon McNally Bursary, valued at $720.00, was established in memory of Simon McNally, founder of Simon McNally and Sons Limited Construction Company. It is awarded on the basis of need, scholarship and evidence of construction experience and practical background. To qualify for this award, the student must be a Canadian citizen, registered in Civil Engineering and have successfully completed the first two years of Civil Engineering. In addition, the student must submit a brief report of the Department of Civil Engineering describing his-her construction experience. The award will be made in the fall term of the third year.

The successful candidate for the 1975-76 session was David Hubble.

OFY cancelled

Ottawa (CUP)---THE National Union of Students has called for Manpower Minister Robert Andras to meet with "representatives of Canadian post-secondary students to discuss the cancellation of the Opportunities for Youth and its effect on students and other Canadian youth."

The program's elimination could mean the loss "of 30,000 summer jobs, jobs directed at those most in need of employment."

This year's jobless rate will probably be larger than the "all-time high", of 1970 when the program was established. That year it was 12 percent, while predictions for this year are in the order of 13.1 percent.

NUS finds it "impossible to understand how the cancellation of OFY, which will hit hardest those in need, can be presented as an attempt to continue social progress." The NUS contends that this is the kind of social progress Canada can do without."

Cutbacks abroad

Ontario universities are not the only ones which are having to curtail spending.

In a memorandum sent to the British Secretary of state for Education and Science, Mr. Mulley, by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors of the universities, it was stated that the universities cannot economize anymore without lasting damage being done. The report was made in anticipation of government decisions on how large to make the university grants for 1976-77.

In recent years the staff-student ratio has been reduced from 1:8.5 to 1:10 and five hundred academic posts have been left vacant. Further economies would cause the ratio to decrease even further.

Cuts in grants could also lead to reductions in equipment, and building and laboratory hours. Consequently, research would have to be reduced.

Existing vacancies in subjects would not be filled. 1 million pounds sterling would be cut from the energy budget.

The memorandum stated that the universities realized that they had to economize but that they had been forced to accept larger reductions than any other educational institutions. The Vice-Chancellors want a strong economic base upon which to plan, one which takes into account inflation and increased enrolment.

AMS referendum

CFRC needs our continued support

submitted by Steve Cutway and Tom Shand

The upcoming campus-wide referendum February 4th and 5th includes the following question: "Shall the 1975-76 student interest fee of twenty-five cents (per student), levied on behalf of the CFRC Sports Trust Fund to help finance the broadcasting of Queen's athletic activities, be continued annually?"

In the past, CFRC has broadcast all Golden Gael football games and as many hockey and basketball games as funds permitted. These broadcasts were made possible through private tax-deductible donations from interested students and student groups, Queen's faculty and staff, Queen's alumni and other listeners in Kingston and area. Funds were solicited through the annual campaign usually held in late September or early October. This method had its shortcomings. The main thrust of the canvass focussed on students living on campus. Because the canvassers were themselves student volunteers it was physically impossible to visit everyone in the Queen's community personally. Letters were sent to the various student societies and groups with about a 33 percent response. Some people found the idea of canvassing distasteful, as did some of those canvassed. Revenues were not sufficient to cover committed expenses. These commitments had to be made no later than mid-August, the date our programme schedule for the upcoming fall season had to be in the printer's hands. Thus the funding of sports broadcasts had a hand-to-mouth existence.

For these reasons, we felt that if sports broadcasts were to continue, the CFRC Sports Trust Fund should be put on a more definite and permanent basis. Because those students who gave voluntarily usually contributed no less than twenty-five cents, we proposed in early 1975 that the A.M.S. student interest fee be increased by the amount of twenty-five cents on our behalf for a one-year trial period. Due to circumstances beyond our control, we missed last February's campus-wide referendum, but approval was given for the increase at the A.M.S. Annual Meeting held in March.

Now we are asking for your support to continue the levy - and in doing so, point out that we are not asking for any increase but only that the twenty-five cent levy be continued.

The costs, particularly for away broadcasts - games which are played at locations other than Queen's - are considerable, approximately $250 each. This includes the installation and rental of telephone lines in each location, including George Richardson Stadium during the football season and R.M.C. when the Hockey Gaels must play at the Constantine because exams are in progress at the Jock Harty; long distance charges, which vary depending on the distance, time of day and length of broadcast (most broadcasts last between 2½ and 3 hours); travel expenses which also vary depending on the distance travelled; and meals. Very rarely is accommodation necessary. As well, special additional telephone equipment has been installed at CFRC which enables our telephone lines to be put on the air, which is necessary for you to hear the live play-by-play and colour commentary. The cost of this equipment is approximately $800 per annum, one third of which is borne by the sports fund. Costs increase significantly when a team makes the play-offs and travels to either the Maritimes or the western provinces. In 1970, for example, one play-off game in Winnipeg cost over $700 which by today's prices would be considerably more. Travel costs decrease somewhat when the broadcast crew can travel on a team bus. This is not possible during the football season because of the large number of team-associated personnel who must attend the games. Thus cars must be rented to transport the crew and equipment.

The costs related to sports broadcasts are considerable. As non-commercial stations, CFRC and CFRC-FM realize no revenue from any of our programming. In a commercial situation, advertisers' revenues would easily meet these costs.

If you enjoyed any or all of our broadcasts this season, if you have any interest in athletics at Queen's, or if you want to ensure the continuation of sports broadcasts on CFRC, vote "Yes" in next week's referendum. With your support this year, we have had the most comprehensive broadcast schedule of Queen's athletic events in our history. We want this to continue and we hope you do too. Support the efforts of our volunteer student broadcasters by voting "Yes" in the referendum next Wednesday or Thursday. Remember, you're voting for a continuation of the levy at its present level, not an increase. Make your voice count

Outstanding teacher mourned by many

Frank Albert Knox, graduate and emeritus professor of Queen's University and eminent economist, died in Kingston January 25, 1976 at the age of 81.

A native of Orono, Ontario, Dr. Knox enroled at Queen's in the fall of 1920 in history and economics. He studied under O. D. Skelton, whose knowledge of Canadian economics and politics had gained respect among his colleagues at Queen's and in government circles. Later, Frank Knox would become known as "one of O.D.Skelton's boys," a member of a band of young economists who left their mark in this same field.

After graduation in 1923, he began a career in teaching at Queen's which was to continue for forty years. Hundreds of Queen's students enroled each year in his introductory economics course as his reputation for concise, informative and interesting lectures increased

Professor Knox was head of the department of political and economic science for many years.

In commenting on Professor Knox's death, Principal Watts said "Professor Knox was a superb teacher. I deeply admired and respected him as a colleague and as a personal friend. There are countless students who look back on his course in economic history as a general education in itself, and many others who will remember him as an outstanding Queen's man and Canadian."

AMS researcher

Nancy Bowes

Kathy Grant, the AMS researcher, wants students to know that she is there to do studies on matters of concern to the University.

Grant began work for the AMS on November 1, 1975. Her office is in the basement of the Union inside the west door.

Grant's most recent project is a study of the Queen's library system. She hopes it "will lead to recommendations for improvement." Most students need a heightened awareness of the problems involved in maintaining a good library.

Conversations with library workers revealed to Grant the absence of a liaison between the users of the library and those processing the users' demands. Grant pointed out that any student may ask the library to order a book that is required for school work. The people who demand particular books have to be aggressive to find out where the book is.

Grant hopes to do a study on student housing soon. Her first project was to designate on a map of Kingston the places where Queen's students live. Grant would like to see students who rent from the same landlord join in tenants' associations.

Nominations invited for teaching award

The Fourth Annual Ontario Colleges and Universities Faculty Association awards have been announced. These awards are designed to produce greater recognition of, and therefore incentive to, teaching excellence.

Under the terms of the program any interested group or individual may sponsor a teacher. Evidence should come from as many sources as possible (students, colleagues, chairmen, deans, administrators, faculty committees etc.) to prove a wide range of recognition.

Any areas of importance to instruction, classroom work, laboratory work, course preparation, team teaching, audio-visual work etc. can be considered

Nominations for the 1976 awards should be sent to: OCUFA Committee on Teaching Awards, 40 Sussex Avenue, Toronto M5S 1J7 for receipt no later than March 15, 1976.

Up to twenty citations will be presented this year. Two previous OCUFA Award winners at Queen's have been Professor B.J Kirby in the Mathematics Department and Professor A.W.Jolliffe of the Geology Department---both in 1973.

Radio Waterloo forced off air

WATERLOO (CUP)-Radio Waterloo, the University of Waterloo student radio station which has existed since 1965, was forced off the air January 13 by a ruling of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission (CRTC).

Radio Waterloo has been seeking clarification of its status from the CRTC since 1970. The Commission then informed them that they could transmit via cable until a definite policy was formulated.

Grand River Cable made application in 1972 to continue carrying the station. This application was rejected in January of 1976. The ruling stems from the fact that Radio Waterloo was not a licensed station, and the new cable policy statement released by the CRTC on December 16 allows only licensed stations to have their programmes carried on cable.

Radio Waterlon went off the air January 13 and will not resume broadcasting until a license is obtained A request for money to finance the application has been made to the University of Waterloo Student Federation, but Federation President John Shortall said the request could only be accommodated in next year's budget.

Radio Waterloo, in the meantime, hopes to set up production teams to train staff and to produce programmes that will "still be relevant" when Radio Waterloo returns to the air.

Kierans talks tonight

Tonight the Hon. Eric Kierans will address Queen's students on the subject, "The Canadian Economy." The lecture will begin at 8:00 pm in the Dunning Auditorium.

Kierans is a Professor in the Department of Economics at McGill University. He was born in 1914 in Montreal and attended Loyola and McGill. He is a career economist who has served in such distinguished posts as Director of the McGill School of Finance, President of the Montreal Stock Exchange and the President of the Quebec Liberal Federation. Kierans was first elected to the Quebec Legislature in 1963 and first to the House of Commons in 1968, the year he was appointed to the Privy Council. He served as Postmaster General and Minister of Communications from 1968 until his resignation in 1971. Kierans is the author of Challenge of Confidence: Kierans on Canada, published in 1967.

Education:

high quality

Socialist Slate

Sarah Yarnell

"Quality of education means nothing without quality of life," explained members of the Socialist Slate. The university is integrated with society and the capitalist economic system, and is an elitist institution attended by the sons and daughters of corporation presidents and senior civil servants. Because it is so integrated with the capitalist system, the university is not fulfilling its critical role, the group said. It is not providing a real examination of social order. The slate argued that a "myth of objectivity" prevails in the study of economics, and said the discipline is studied as if it were undisputed fact. "There is no real examination of bourgeois economics," and areas such as monopoly capitalism, and the "real implications of limits to growth" are ignored.

University students should be addressing themselves to society's problems, said the socialists. Students should be examining the prisons here in Kingston, and Queen's should have programmes in women's studies and native people's studies. "Inter-disciplinary studies are necessary so that "problem areas can be focused upon," they said.

The Socialist Slate stressed that student participation in university decision-making must increase by "reformulation of the Departmental Student Councils (DSCs)." The group would give more "clout" to the DSCs by having the AMS co-ordinate them. "The AMS would be a centre, and would provide resources," said the socialists. They contended that "right now there is no power behind the DSCs."

Students should have a greater part in decisions to grant tenure, said the slate. They should increase their role in course formulation by improving course evaluation and by forming course unions.

Students should have a greater part in university decisions to grant tenure, said the socialists. They said that currently young professors, who might be doing controversial research, are not being granted tenure. Because the university has so many tenured staff, the new academics are being "cut out."

The slate said that unionization of faculty would be a possible alternative to tenure, but is not the best thing possible. "In several areas, unionization wouldn't improve over tenure," they said. The group contended that unionization would be better for support staff, part-time professors and graduate students, all who have lower incomes than faculty. A large number of these persons are women, the slate said.

The socialists said they disagreed with the competition for marks which prevails at Queen's. "The ideal seems to be not that you are here to learn but you're here to get a good mark," they said.

Cindy Hall

Sarah Yarnell

"We have to look at the fact that we're not the only people in society," said Bob Butterill, candidate for AMS Vice-President (Operations). Cindi Hall, running for AMS President, said that the 14.4 percent increase in global funding received by Ontario universities for the coming year is sufficient. "We should be happy that we got 14.4 percent, which is greater than the rate of inflation, said Butterill.

Hall added that students should lobby to keep grants to universities above the rate of inflation.

In many ways, tenure has come to mean job security without review, said Hall. She recommended "some sort of continual review" of tenured professors, and said that "whatever review is done in the future will have to have more emphasis on teaching than currently exists. Hall stressed that evaluation of a professor's teaching by his peers and students should be more important than it is currently. She advocated that merit pay increases should be based less on a professor's research and more on his teaching abilities. She also suggested that there be more teaching awards such as the existing Alumni award for excellence in teaching.

Hall, who is a member of the AMS policy advisory committee on OFS, has recently helped compile a report on tenure. She said that tenure was a "complex problem". Student opinions have been left out of the tenure issue, and this is "extremely dangerous," she said.

Hall said that in cases of fluctuations in student demand for courses, professors' talents could be re-directed through re-training.

Ross Brown, candidate for Vice-President (University Affairs) said that students have to take a stand on unionization because it will affect them. "Unionization will downgrade the quality of education" if seniority is used as a basis for firing professors, said Brown. He explained that seniority is a common method of determining lay-offs, and claimed that there was a possibility that this could be used at Queen's.

Hall said that library acquisitions were decreasing and that study space in campus libraries was running out. She claimed that there has been a lack of long-term planning for the library. There is a need for "consolidation" of library books and periodicals in order to cut down on duplication, said Hall. Queen's students should use Kingston's other three libraries, she remarked.

Jamie Avis

Sarah Yarnell

Jamie Avis, candidate for AMS President, said that criteria by which to objectively judge teaching ability is needed at Queen's. He also suggested that professors need some kind of training in teaching methods.

Criteria for merit pay increases should be tied more closely to teaching ability, said Avis. In some cases, poor teachers should be required to teach less and be allowed to pursue research, he said.

Avis claimed that there exist ways other than tenure of protecting academic freedom. He suggested that tenured professors be evaluated every four or five years, and that excellence in both teaching and research be looked for. Kathy Wood, candidate for AMS Vice-President (University Affairs) said that she didn't believe persons on tenure should have permanent job security, but stressed that something is needed to protect academic freedom.

Avis said that currently course evaluations are not as effective as they should be, and that the entire university should be involved. "There has to be more commitment and study on all sides," said Avis. He remarked that course evaluation should continue to be handled by the various faculty societies as each is very specific to the particular faculty.

Cutbacks in areas of library acquisitions and technical equipment must be avoided, said Avis.

Avis said that "unionization is a reality in our society, and is something quite necessary for industrial peace." He said he would neither encourage nor discourage unionization of faculty or staff at Queen's because it is illegal to interefere in this area.

Universities and students have to continue to put pressure on the provincial government to maintain the high quality of post-secondary education in Ontario, agreed the team. Avis said that currently universities are not receiving sufficient funds from the government.

Tuition hike just not right

Dear Editors:

As the threat of a huge rise in tuition fees hangs over the poor benighted souls of this campus like a Trac 2 Guillotine, I would like to suggest an alternative which I feel ought to be considered, even if not liked. Ms. Banting, in her letter to Tuesday's Journal, sees the hike in fees as not only justified, but good for us, as it would weed out the academic zombies that come here and waste their time, and the universities space and money. In my humble opinion, that sort of attitude only contributes to the strong preference universities have already demonstrated to acquiring rich brats. That crew of bored children will not be at all discouraged by thousand-dollar tuition fees because they're usually the people whose stay at this scholarly resort is totally financed by parents who are quite well off and couldn't bear it if junior were to become a (shudder) dropout.

Let me propose instead, that expenses be decreased not by raising our fees, but raising our academic standards; not only for entry into first year, but for each succeeding year here. Hopefully, we could decrease the number of students sufficiently to keep the place supplied with good professors and functioning equipment. It would also increase the credibility and value of a university degree. And, the first people to disappear from campus would be those who weren't interested or willing to work.

Or, let me offer an even more viable, less upsetting suggestion. Money spent on education is far less wasted than money spent on already rich MP's salaries, prime ministerial limousines, the ridiculous wastefulness I've seen first-hand in our civil service, the expensive self-promotional campaigns the Government gleefully cranks out, useless studies set up to employ political cronies, purchases of armaments that are obsolete in an age of nuclear warfare...I could get farther and farther afield from our own pathetically small financial dilemma, but I have made my point deafeningly clear.

Also, Ms. Banting, I will be a taxpayer in a year or two. But although I undoubtedly will grouse over the exorbitant taxes we pay to a spendthrift government, I will remind myself that though I am no longer a student, I am not only recompensing the country for the opportunity they gave me to improve myself, but financing the education of many others who are trying to better both their lives and our world.

What's foreign in foreigners?

Dear Editors:

This is a letter written hoping to achieve better understanding between Canadian students and the so-called 'foreigners.'

While it is a fact that there is a gap between these two groups, nobody has ever tried to bring up the issue and solve it. Things like "foreign students do not get involved in many things, and keep to themselves" are quite often being observed, but has anybody tried to find out why? The International Student Centre has established quite a bit of time, but apart from setting up parties, tournaments and exchanging students, no effort has been shown to try to bridge the gap.

I am a foreign student myself and having been in Canada for more than two years, I have experienced enough to say that Canadians do not have a clear view of what these foreigners are, why they are here, and what they are doing. More often than not, they tend to think that the foreign students are the ones that get the high marks, segregate themselves into a group and, worst of all, get all the jobs. This kind of view merely makes the problem more touchy and so hardly anybody would bring it up, which creates more false images for the foreign students.

Do try to put yourself into their situation, their culture, and you will appreciate their difficulty in trying to get through. I would also welcome any comments on this letter. Thank you.

Aired thoughts about landlords

Dear Editors:

Since the annual spring rush to acquire housing for next year appears to be in full swing, I thought it might be appropriate at this time to air my feelings on the housing rental process. I have recently been looking for a house and in my search have encountered several landlords, one in particular who shall remain nameless but will undoubtedly be known by reputation, whose methods have made me furious.

This particularly offensive landlord thinks he has the world in his hands and Queen's students around his finger. Unfortunately most students feel the same. Each year hundreds of them sit in front of the same desk and submit to this man's will. They ensure that the next year even more students will be forced to submit to the same routine, for with the money he makes off students one year he is able to buy even more houses the next. He gets richer and more powerful per annum.

Well, you might say, what is to be done about this problem. I suggest that the first thing in order might be a change in our way of thinking. No one landlord completely dominates the housing market in Kingston, yet. Contrary to popular opinion there are still a great many student houses within walking distance of the university owned by landlords with whom it is a pleasure to do business. It is still possible to find a landlord who will treat you like a human being, be attentive to your needs and abide by the Landlord and Tenant Act (without having to be taken to court).

It is high time that we quashed the popular attitude held by many businessmen today that if you, the customer, don't like the way he conducts his business or treats you, then you can go elsewhere and-or shove it in the process. Remember, without the money you are giving these people they cannot survive. They are not doing you a favour by renting you a house or an apartment. You are doing them one by purchasing their service. They should be made to remember this and should conduct themselves accordingly.

Utopian as it may be, if the long lineups at certain housing offices in Kingston suddenly dwindled to a trickle, landlords would quickly change their tunes. I found a house which I loved and was quite prepared to sign a lease until I came across this problem. Now I, like many others, refuse to submit to this tyrannical treatment and will go elsewhere, confident that I can find what I'm looking for. Think about what you are getting into and if you don't like it, get out! Remember, to these people, money talks. You've got the money and therefore the power to change things.

One man's politics

Doug Bonnell

And so I return to the printed page. A year has passed and politics itself has shifted and conformed to new and changing conditions. A year ago Richard Nixon continued his battle with phlebitis, Robert Nixon had yet to go down for the third time, and Davie Barrett was still head-boy in Victoria.

But the past is past and those previous visions, forecasts, predictions and muffs are lost in the backpages of the Journal's history. Now, as always, politics must mold itself on the present and remember, though not relive, the past

It is that battle, between past and present, that faces the Progressive Conservative party as it heads into a leadership convention. For many Conservatives the failure of the federal party lies in its leadership, in the progressive, if somewhat cautious, directions set out by Robert Stanfield. For them power lies in the past, in establishing a clear, precise conservative ideology in an era in which ideology can have little impact. Living in the present will require the party to reject that past. But rejecting the past requires more than rejecting Ronald Reagan should he bomb out in New Hampshire. It requires rejecting old-line approaches to political financing and political choice as well.

The one candidate who represents the old-line more than any other is not Jack Horner or Paul Hellyer, but a thirty-six year old lawyer from Baie Comeau, Quebec whose name is Brian Mulroney. In the tactics, financing, and image of the Mulroney candidacy can be found the remains of an older, less realistic period.

Brian Mulroney is the establishment candidate. The establishment are those people, mostly men, who control the Conservative backrooms--people like Alan Eagleson, Attorney-General Roy McMurtry, Ontario Youth President John Tory, and Quebec PC President Claude Dupras who all back the Mulroney candidacy. Mulroney is playing patrician-establishment politics in a convention where political success lies in a grassroots-populistic approach.

There are lurking suspicions that Mulroney's highly-financed campaign is being substantially supported by Power Corporation's Paul Desmarais, a circumstance which, if true, creates massive vested interests in his candidacy Mulroney, however, irresponsibly denies knowledge of any campaign financing.

And where is the money going? It's being used to bus, fly, or drive voting delegates to meet the man. Somewhat more subtle than a bottle of scotch, eh, what?

The Mulroney campaign reeks of the slick, glib phrases of worn-out political hacks. His brochure recalls that at twelve he predicted he would be Prime Minister and that his wife's main ambition is to have "a stationwagon full of kids".

The Conservative party could survive an ideological shift to the right, particularly when the country appears to be heading in the same direction. Whether it can morally endure Brian Mulroney's campaign remains to be seen.

Copeland's churchmouse

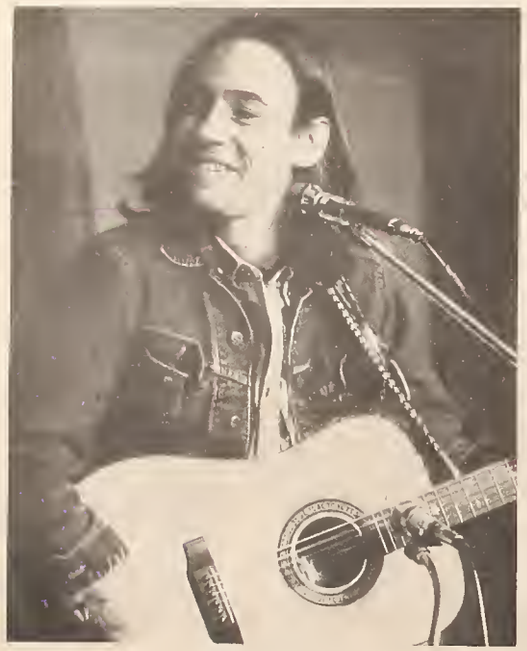
Brian Copeland

The most difficult assignment for a journalist is to report a story without bias. Newspapers should be called news comments because at best they are a reflection of a group of individuals on a variety of subjects. Consider an auto accident, and the problem when reporting it to the police officer. As many witnesses as there are will equal the number of versions of the accident.

A story that appears in this paper is the view of usually one sole reporter. And depending on how he or she felt that night, or whether they liked the assignment or not is reflected in the final edition of the story. Personalities also enter into the story. I tend to be a bit of a cynic, and that reality is reflected in this column.

What is dastardly is that papers rarely acknowledge their bias. For example, the Kingston Whig-Standard is a well known Liberal Party newspaper, just as the ASUS Lictor is ostensibly a socialist paper. That is not to say that they reek of the Liberal Party or of Socialism, but that these papers tend towards certain philosophies, and often this is reflected in their reporting.

At election time, the problem of bias is especially difficult. You may have noticed certain comments in Tuesday's Journal which reflect the larger problem of what is bias reporting and what is without bias. Editors, in their wisdom, have one philosophy, and reporters may have a different one. But that is the reality of a newspaper. Every journalist, whether a reporter, or an editor, has a bias which is reflected in the news story. Thankfully, most university students understand that reality, and read the story from their own viewpoint, in other words with their own bias.



Newspaper people, and especially student types, forget that the paper is as much a political vehicle as a mass rally. One only has to look at AMS politicians to realize that when they brown-nose Journal people, they are acknowledging that the Journal is a political vehicle with possibly more power than the politician himself xxxxxxxxxx

My associate, Doug Bonnell is, we understand, rejoining the paper as a star columnist. We wish him well and look forward to reading "One Man's Politics". We ran into Gaye Gooder recently, and promised an inclusion, so here it is in black and white. After last fall's column on sex, a letter from Jack Froth in the Observer reports that a study at UWO by Dr. J.A Silcox indicates that all of the professions, ministers have more active sex lives after age 65. It has been suggested that this would be a selling point to get people to consider the ministry. And one must conclude that a minister's sex life is just as active at 45 or younger, which is probably one good reason for a woman to marry a cleric.

Interestingly,the Silcox study indicated that journalists have the worst sex lives after age 65. Did I just hear that my editors were about to resign and take up the ministry?

These thoughts for a Friday are dedicated to my hardworking, intelligent, and creative associates at the Journal.

Brent Titcomb is appearing this weekend at the Scarecrow

Folk music and natural food: a new Kingston recipe

Paul Dalle-Molle

Its full name is Scarecrow Natural Foods Restaurant and Coffee House. You will not find it on the "approved and recommended" list of the Ontario Automobile Association, nor is it included in Anne Hardy's Where To Eat In Canada. Neither ommission, however, should disturb the Scarecrow people or their patrons; O.A.A. approval is somewhat akin to a Montrealer boasting about the Olympic Games, and Where To Eat includes only one Kingston eatery, the Continental, thereby indicating at least some similarity among those excluded: an array of standouts such as Wally's Place, Aunt Lucy's, Morrison's, and the Queen's Student Union. But Scarecrow is unique in this area.

Scarecrow's proprietor is Bram Fischer, an open and dilligent guy who speaks with great enthusiasm about his work. He opened the place in November and has been working night and day since then, refining the business, ironing out flaws, and learning from his mistakes. Scarecrow's location (169 Princess, second floor) is the former home of The Razor's Edge Coffee House. Two years ago The Razor's Edge was host to such performers as Skeeter Davis, Murray McLaughlan, and Jesse Winchester. The coffee house could not pay the overhead costs alone, however, and eventually folded. Bram kept this in mind, and the idea of a combination coffee house and natural foods restaurant appeared to be the logical solution to the problem. It seems to be working well. The restaurant opens at 11:45 a.m., and the last order is taken at 6:15. This insures that dinner customers will be finished their meals and out of the restaurant early enough to make arrangements for the coffee house, which opens at 8:30, with the music beginning at about 9.

Bram's goal is to serve a variety of wholesome foods at reasonable prices in a relaxed, "laid back" atmosphere. I'm happy to report that Scarecrow meets the requirements. Bram does not use canned or frozen products. There are few exceptions made to his policy of purchasing undyed, unprocessed food. He buys his dry goods from Tara Natural Foods, his perishables from local farmers and Quattrochi's, his eggs from the Egg Grading Station, and his cheese (top quality) from a small Belleville outfit. The cook is David, who was also the cook at the Banyan Restaurant, Kingston's first natural foods restaurant, which folded a few years back. David believes in being gentle with food, letting the natural flavors come through with as little alteration as possible. For instance, he considers the Steamed Vegetables with Cheese Sauce Dinner ($2.25) to be a very rewarding meal to prepare, because the trick to making it is in disturbing each ingredient only slightly. To this end, he uses salt sparingly, a refreshing change from standard procedure.

As at any specialty restaurant, Scarecrow's menu is a delight. The handsome printing and the variety of interesting foods make it fun to read. Yoghurt Shakes ($.75) are nutritious concoctions of yoghurt, milk, honey, and fruit juice (your choice of orange, apple, pear, grapefruit, carrot, celery, or tomato). It is hearty, healthy, and delicious, and well worth the price. Salad freaks will find four offered: Cole Slaw, Potato, Chef's and Fruit. The Fruit Salad, "a meal in a bowl", is the crowning achievement in this category. It is made with all sorts of fruits, nuts, wheatgerm, yoghurt and honey. Scarecrow does not scrimp on any of these ingredients, and the result is quite pleasing and not expensive ($1.10).

The Banyan Broiled is a hot, open-face vegetable and cheese sandwich, and the most popular item at lunchtime. Stuffed Eggplant and Quiche Lorraine both require one hour to prepare, and should be ordered in advance by phone. Quche-experts tell me, however, that Scarecrow's effort is a mediocre one. My peonic palate decided that it was bland but otherwise acceptable. A gourmet will probably find the crust too thick and the Quiche too heavy. Perhaps Nora Poole (who makes the best Quiche this side of Paris) will take time away from the Drama Department to give David her secret recipe.

The Home Fried Potatoes ($1.55) and the Fried Rice ($2.25) are better in quality and value than any similar fare in town. The Baked Beans ($1.85) are quite good, but their tartness and the overwhelming flavor of molasses may turn you off. The meals are nicely complemented by almost two dozen types of tea (a 2½ cup pot for $.40) and homemade desserts.

Scarecrow comes highly recommended: good food, good portions, good prices, with a relaxed and attractive atmosphere. But there are some problems. Towards the end of the week they are sure to be out of something you want, and this can be quite annoying. The service is inconsistent; sometimes there is no knife, sometimes no napkin, sometimes no waitress to get badly needed water or to take your dessert order. Bram should change his laundery dates, too, because weekend customers seem to get dirty tablecloths and place mats. The employees are quite friendly, though, and Bram will go out of his way to get you just what you want; simply ask.

Scarecrow Coffee House is in the tradition of alcohol-free cafes which grew in the 1960's in Eastern North American cities, and which catered to folk and folk-rock fans, who were mostly students. These are places such as New York's Bitter End, Montreal's Yellow Door, and especially, Philadelphia's legendary Main Point. The hot apple cider is great, as is the hot apple crisp ($.40 each). The quiet, clean atmosphere is ideal; even the acoustics are good. It can get a bit crowded sometimes, but it is generally coats and hats, and not people, which are in the way. Last week's headliner, Tom Handy, was disappointing. He seemed bored and tired, and soon his audience developed a disinterest which he deserved. His friend Frank Wheeler, who played the break set, is a different storey. He has guitar talent, a fine moderate voice, outstanding audience rapport, good timing, and a nice sense of humour. His set more than made up for the opening set of Tad Chapman and Brian Barrie, which was disastrous except for the beautiful (if uncontrolled) voice of Brian. Future performers will be David Bradstreet (next week) and Lisa Garber (two weeks). Brent Titcomb is playing presently. Admission is $2.50.

A Canadian play and much much more

Herschel Hardin's Esker Mike And His Wife Agiluk might be called a play about the conflict between the Eskimo and white cultures. That would not be untrue, but in the theatre, it is that and much, much more.

Subtitled Scenes From Life In The Mackenzie River Delta the play focuses on a white trapper, Esker Mike, and his Eskimo wife, Agiluk, who live in the remote Arctic settlement of Aklavik. She has decided to have no more children since their small income forces them to send the children to missionary schools in the government town of Inuvik. Her method of birth control is to stop having sex with her husband–a step he naturally opposes.

The main plot sounds simple, but this is not a play about sexism, nor a sociological tract on ethnic conflicts. It is rather deeply about human needs, fears and desires, written in a cool, almost poetic style that reveals but does not exploit the fiercely human powers beneath the surface.

Herschel Hardin is a Canadian writer with impressive credits behind him in Drama and broadcasting. He wrote this play during the Centennial Year, though it was not produced until the Factory Lab Theatre presented it in Toronto in 1971. It has been published in The Drama Review, broadcast by the C.B.C. and enjoyed numerous productions around Canada. Currently, Talonbooks in Vancouver publishes the script.

In the wide and not the narrow sense, this is a Canadian play--though about a part of our national life few of us know directly. It is a work filled with sympathy for all concerned, but also with a sharp eye for the harsh truths we must face–not only in the deep north but throughout the land. The Queen's Drama Department is pleased to continue its long tradition of presenting Canadian plays with Herschel Hardin's Esker Mike And His Wife Agiluk.

The performance runs February 5, 6, 7, 12, 13, 14 at 8:30 p.m in Convocation Hall. Tickets are $2 on Thursdays, $1 for students, and $3 on Fridays and Saturdays, $2 for students, available at the Drama Desk, 547-6291, and at the door.

Stringband to play at West Campus

Stringband is a group of Toronto-based folk musicians, composers and singers, who have successfully recorded and distributed two albums, appeared on countless television shows, and won applause from personalities as diverse as John Diefenbaker (they wrote a song about him!) and John Hartford.

Stringband is headed by Bob Bossin and Marie-Lynn Hammond. Both sing, both play guitar and banjo, and both have written the bulk of the material the band uses (the rest is usually traditional, from old-time banjo and fiddle songs to country reels). They are supported by fiddle player Terry King, who hails from Montreal and who used to play with Quebec's superstar singer, Robert Charlebois. On many dates, the group is augmented by the strong bass playing of Al Soberman - and many Stringband concerts feature guest appearances by a variety of friends, relatives, and even Bossin's dog, Roach.

Stringband's combination of instrumental skill, good humor, deftly-stated concern and sheer charm - a rare word in any music industry lexicon these days - is making them countless friends from coast to coast.

Stringband will be appearing this Saturday night at 8 P.M. at McArthur Hall. Admission is $2.00.

Wooden Patterns

An exhibition of wooden patterns from the Canadian Locomotive Company of Kingston begins on February 8th in the Agnes Etherington Art Centre. The Canadian Locomotive Company evolved from a small foundry in the 1850's to become a major industry in Kingston, producing steam locomotives and later diesel engines and mining equipment. In 1950 Fairbanks Morse (Chicago) bought the controlling interest and production continued until April, 1969, when the plant was permanently closed.

Patterns are part of the sand casting process in a foundry. They were made mostly from pine, sometimes from hardwood, by machine and with hand tools. They were then carefully finished and sealed with shellac or varnish, or waxed. Some have parts painted in different colours intended as instructions for the workmen. Patterns such as these are sometimes still used, but the ones in the exhibition are all obsolete, and were selected from a large number in the still extant pattern sotrage.

Some will be instantly recognizable as patterns for wheels and gears. Others are more secretive as to their function as they are for parts of machinery not usually seen by most people. Certainly the men who carefully fashioned these patterns did not intend them to be placed on sculpture stands. But whether these finely crafted objects are seen solely as the wooden means to an iron end (form following function), as relics from the Steam Age and a defunct old Kingston Company, or, now out of context, simply as sculptural objects, evocative of worlds far beyond the Kingston train yards, will be up to the individual viewer.

The patterns are generously on loan to the Art Centre from William Teron of Ottawa, and will be on display from February 8 to March 11.

On Sunday, February 8, the first day of the exhibition, the Gallery Association will hold a "Railroader" sandwich lunch special from 1:00 to 3:00 p.m.

On Tuesday, February 10 at 12:30 p.m. there will be a brown bag lunch with Peter Harrell, model engineer and builder of miniature steam engines and steam locomotives, who will talk about, and answer questions about some of the more technical aspects of Patterns and steam locomotives. Bring your sandwich, coffee will be provided.

Greek and Roman life in miniature

A special exhibition prepared by the Greek and Roman Department of the Royal Ontario Museum in which, through about 45 objects from their collection (painted pottery, terra-cotta figurines, engraved gems etc.), seven aspects of Greek and Roman daily life are illustrated. The topics are Religion, Athletics, Social Life, Women and Domestic Life, Men in War and Peace, Transportation and Animals. The exhibition will run from January 31 to February 29.

To give a further dimension to this exhibition, the following events, to be held in the Art Centre, are scheduled:

Thursday, February 5 at 7:30 p.m. Neda Leipen, Curator of the Greek and Roman Department of the ROM, will give an illustrated lecture on GREEK AND ROMAN DAILY LIFE, with reference to objects in the exhibition and in the Royal Ontario Museum.

Mrs. Leipen is a graduate in Classical Studies of the Universities of Zagreb and Toronto (MA) and has been Curator and Head of the Greek and Roman Department of the ROM since 1967. She has published widely in the field of Classical and archaeological studies and is currently working on a publication of the Greek and Roman sculpture in the collection of the Royal Ontario Museum.

Thursday, February 12 at 7:30 p.m., Dr. Dietmar Hagel of the Department of Classics will give an illustrated lecture on OLYMPIA AND THE OLYMPIC GAMES. He will speak about the history of the excavations at Olympia and the architectural remains of the sacred district; of their games, their organization, their significance for the Greek world and their possible origin.

Dr. Hagel received his Ph.D. form the University of Erlangen and taught in Berlin before coming to Queen's in 1968. In 1972-73 he was a member of staff of the University of Minnesota Messenia Expedition working as trenchmaster during the excavation of a Mycenaean settlement at Nichoria, Messenia, Greece.

Both these timely lecutres are open to the public and admission is free.

Chicken has always been a good main course. It is inexpensive and most people enjoy it. There are also many methods of preparation which make it taste very different each time it is served and it provides unlimited possibilities for left-over recipes as well.

The cheapest way to buy chicken is whole. Prices for separate parts (ie. breasts, wings, legs and hips) tend to be much more expensive because you are paying for the convenience of the chicken being precut. There can be a drawback to this besides the price because some stores cut the chicken by machine. This can give you a package of pieces which are not uniform in size and will take different lenghts of time to cook. It also results in bone splinters when the bone has not been separated right at the joint. These could be dangerous if swallowed. So your best bet is to buy up several chickens when you see then on special (and this is one item which is very often on sale) and separate them yourself. All you need is a sharp knife and a quick less on chicken anatomy. Separate them into breasts, wings, legs, thighs, backs and necks. These can easily be frozen in groups and then used whenever necessary. You can substitute any of these parts when preparing a recipe such as today's except for the necks and backs, however, which can be saved for making soup. This recipe will be featured in a later column.

Chicken Ragout (Preparation time - 1½ hours, serves 6)

½ cup sliced celery
½ cup chopped onion
3 tbsp. margarine
3-4 lb. chicken
1 cup carrots sliced
1 28oz. can tomatoes
1 bay leaf
1 tsp. salt

In a large suacepan, saute celery and onion in margarine until soft. Romove from pan. Add chicken and brown well on all sides. Add celery and onions, along with remaining ingredients. Simmer for 1 hour. Thicken sauce with 3 tbsp. cornstarch or flour mixed will with 1-3 cup of water. Remove the bay leaf before serving

Squash Gals take 2nd spot

Portia Leggat

Last Friday five members (Sandra Harris, Portia Leggat, Willa Henry, Sheila Patterson, Roma Steele) of the women's Squash team drove to Waterloo for the University of Waterloo invitational squash tournament. Eleven teams from around the province had been invited to play. In the first round of competition on Friday night Queen's defeated, hands down, the teams from York and The University of Toronto 'B' team. Winning the first round 'pool' the team was thus qualified for the finals. On Saturday the girls faced stiff competition against the other finalists: University of Waterloo and the University of Toronto 'A' team. Queen's won three of the five matches against the Toronto team (with Willa Henry playing fastastically against U. of T.'s Jane Rounthwaite), but failed to win the majority of games against the Waterloo team.

The teams competing in the event were: University of Waterloo (2 teams), University of Toronto (two teams), Queen's, Glendon College, Trent University, York University, McMaster and the University of Western Ontario. Many of the teams were eliminated after play on Friday and the overall final results were: The University of Waterloo 'A' team - first; Queen's - second; and The University of Toronto 'A' team - third. It was a pleasure to attend the Waterloo invitational which, once again, was well organized and efficiently run. The team is looking forward to its next match which is Hamilton at McMaster on the weekend of February 13-14.

Gee-Gees trample Queen's

Gaels...

Alps Boniwell

The Queen's Golden Gaels basketball team has, it seems, improved on a very old but much practiced art, the art of deception. Not only are they very competent at not appearing as that which they really are but they also are deceivingly good at it. Indeed nobody hearing that the Gaels lost to Ottawa, 99-75, on Tuesday would ever think Queen's had more ability than given credit for. Certainly no one would suspect that a team that is 1 and 7 could be any good. But for the skilled practitioners of the Gaels these are the results of that clever art. To stretch literary licence to the end, the Gaels have become deceivingly deceptive, and so accomplished at it you'd think they were doing it on purpose. With the subtlety of a snake in the grass they can stall an opponent through most of the game, staying close, staying within striking range although never being as forthright or as obvious as to take the lead. That, you see, might blow their cover and certainly to do that they would expose themselves as better than, judging by the scores, they appear to be. Losing by 24 to Ottawa will never convince anyone that the Gaels didn't get their teeth kicked in right from the start and the Gee-Gees merely coasted to victory. How perfectly deceptive. Few people will ever know that Ottawa, now 8-2 was forced to play very good basketball in order to beat a stubborn and hustling Queen's team. Nor will they ever know that the Gaels do have more ability than given credit for. Unfortunately everyone knows the Gaels have an anaemic win column and even a massive transfusion now isn't likely to save their playoff lives.

Against the Gee-Gee's, Queen's deceptive capabilities probably reached it's acme. Never did they give away too much at one time but a steady stream of little mistakes eventually pooled into a sturdy collection of 24 points. Turnovers especially hurt. With 16 in the first half alone the Gaels seemed to have found the perfect vehicle for losing unobtrusively. Indeed if it is holier to give than receive the Gaels should all be saints by now. So for that matter should the referees who were so magnanimous they never tired of the joy of handing out fouls to the Gaels. Unfortunately then only the Gee-Gees who gave away nothing on defense escaped sainthood. Derek Swinnard however managed to escape the Ottawa defense often enough to hit for 14 of 23 from the floor and 30 points in addition to a game-high 7 rebounds. Andy Boniwell and Dave Dempster absconded with 12 and 10 points respectively. At the other end of the court rookie Bob Sebera had 21 while Rod McDonald notched 15.

This weekend the Gaels travel to Toronto to play an exhibition match against Erindale College and a league encounter against the Toronto Blues. My feeling is that the Gaels are going to quit the deception and make it obvious the way they feel about U of T. It'd be a nice change.

Gals...

Lyn Atwood

Tuesday afternoon the women's and men's basketball teams trooped off to the Nation's glorious capital to challenge the Ottawa Gee-Gees on their home court.

The women had played the Gee-Gees previously in the season and beaten them by a small margin. The 2 teams are running neck and neck in the league. As a result of this game (which the Gals lost 51-41) the women have dropped behind Ottawa to a third place position in the league. The high scorer for the Gals was Kathy Keely with 17 pts.. Kim Headford chipped in 12. Kim was also the leading rebounder for Queen's pulling down 11.

The shooting percentage for the Gals was 30 percent but they put up 20 fewer shots than the Gee-Gees. The Gals travelled to Ottawa yesterday to play the Laurentian Voyageurs. The results were not known to the Journal at press time.

Bews News

Paul Findlay

Kingston's weather came back to normal this week just in time to postpone the cross-country ski meet from Monday until Wednesday. Results were not available at press time.

Other sports, however, are progressing. In Curling each team has played two games. The undefeated teams are Comm '76, Bus. Grads., Mining and P.H.E.

There must be something that makes lawyers good bowlers, because in Bowling after two weeks the top two teams in each division are Law teams. In the Tuesday division Law '77 has 20 points (out of a possible 22), Law '76 has 16. In the Thursday division Law '77 has 24 points (out of 26), Law '76 has 23.

In Basketball PHE lost its first Basketball game in 5 years to Arts '79 in a 45-42 thriller. Other scores: Education 49, Law '76-11; Law '77-36; Mining 33; Comm. '79-40; Arts '78-38; Meds. 30; Civil Math 22; Comm. '78-47, Artsci Grads. 23; Science '79-45; Comm. '76-27; Bus. Grads. 59; Comm. '77-37.

Monday night was probably one of the most exciting nights in Ball Hockey history. We had 2 upsets: Comm.'78-3 - Arts '76-0, and the impressive Mechanical squad remained unbeaten by defeating PHE 3-1 thanks to goalie Brian Livingston. But the most exciting game was a hard-hitting affair between the defending champs Arts '77 and the Bus. Grads. The game was characterized by some super body checks by the Arts defense. Bus. Grads goalie Renwick made several outstanding saves, but also had the help of the posts. Arts hit seven of them. Goalie John Lloyd was equally impressive in the Arts net as he recorded his second straight shutout. The final outcome was 1-0 in favour of '77, Ian Whicker's early goal proving to be the winner.

Mike ranks the following teams as the tops: 1. Arts '77 (3-0); 2. Mechanical (3-0); 3. Bus. Grads (2-1); 4. Comm '77 (2-0-1); 5. Law '76 (3-0).

The Standings:

Swim Gals take 3rd

The Queen's Swimming Gals travelled to Waterloo this past weekend, to the Annual Waterloo International Invitational meet. Several American teams competed - Brockport, Eastern Michigan, Rochester, Clarion State, and Oakland. The other Canadian teams were U of T, Guelph, York, Wilfrid Laurier, and Waterloo.

Queen's did quite well, getting eleven places in the consolations, five in the finals, and coming third among the Canadian schools, behind Waterloo and U of T.

Several notable performances were turned in. In the 100 fly, Carol Kennedy set a personal record with a time of 1:12.2, and advanced to the consolation finals. Cindy Whitley entered the 400 free for the first time and did a very respectable 6:01, but more importantly, she kept her times for each 50 constant. In the 50 freestyle, there was a swimoff to decide sixth place. The three swimmers involved went into it with a time of 27.3, and Cathy Brace won with a time of 27.0, a personal best and a new team record. Queen's had two swimmers in the consolations for the 50 fly, and only one second separated the first and sixth qualifiers. Kathy Lennar and Carol Kennedy came through to win it in a time of 31.1. Pam Skene advanced to the finals in the 200 backstroke, and bettered her own previous team record with a time of 2:27.3.

The Gals go to York this Saturday, and to McGill next weekend.

Badminton Gaels Win

J. Stewart

Our team played very well in a tournament last weekend at Wilfred Laurier University. It was one-sided event in which Queen's won all but three matches throughout the day, walking off very handily with the trophy.

Stewart and Neville, playing two and three managed to win all of their matches. Neville and Buckly won all their double games over against a strong team from McMaster. Mike Stouts, played in fourth position. He lost but one match after succumbing to frustration, from the speedy birds. Paul Buckly, the number one player, had some strong opposition, particularly from McMaster, who he eventually lost a match to.

February 7, Queen's will host the OUAA sectional tournament. RMC will undoubtably be the strongest opposition to Queen's winning the top position in the eastern section.

Ian Nordheimer.... "This Is Your Life!"

One of the chief critics of the Queen's Journal for the last several years has been AMS President Ian Nordheimer. Nordheimer has ranted and raved time and time again that the Journal has never had one nice thing to say, one pat on the back or one word of praise for the AMS, particularly the AMS Executive.

Well, Mr. Nordheimer, the Journal is big enough to shake a hand for a job well done, clap or stand on tables and cheer. Hang on to your hat, Ian Nordheimer...."This Is Your Life".

Congratulations are certainly due the AMS Executive, particularly Ian Nordheimer, for the firm stand taken in the recent Bus-it negotiations with Principal Watts.

In the past the University has funded the Bus-it program to the tune of 40 percent which amounted to $3 dollars per student. The remainder of the cost for Bus-it is paid for by students. On January 13, Watts said that the University would continue to fund Bus-it at what he interpreted the current level of funding to be: $3 per full-time student. Nordheimer, at an Outer Council meeting on Jan. 15 spoke of Watts' decision as "unfair and unacceptable" and asserted that he would protest the Principal's decision. Nordheimer was not only upset that students would have to pay a greater amount to the Bus-it program due to a recent price hike by the Public Utilities Commission, but that students would also have to pay for an unfair portion.

Since that time, the Senate Committee on Student Affairs has confirmed that it urged the Principal to continue support of Bus-it at a level of 40 percent, not at the 1975-76 dollar level. At a later meeting, Principal Watts told Nordheimer that he was giving the matter "further consideration". Watts also said he felt that "to increase the subsidy would be difficult in the present financial situation."

Earlier this week, in conference with the AMS executive, Watts has agreed to increase the University contribution to Bus-it to $3.55 per full time student. Nordheimer said that although $3.55 is 40 percent of the 1976-77 Bus-it cost per student, the Principal should make a long term commitment to the Bus-it program.

It is these negotiations we refer to when we commend Nordheimer for a job well done. Only through this type of bargaining can students hope to make themselves represented to the University administration.

Constables on the loose

Dear Editors,
Last Friday night, as we were leaving the Queen's Pub, we witnessed what seemed to be an unwarranted display of abuse on the part of a few A.M.S. constables. At the entrance to the Student Union Building, three AMS constables were "fulfilling their duties" by showing a troublesome student to the door. We are not denying the fact that this person was highly intoxicated and that his conduct prompted immediate action by the AMS. However, we cannot help but feel that the actions they took were somewhat extreme. Common sense should tell them that when it comes to the point of drawing blood, they should stop. Granted, some form of discipline is needed on such occasions, but may we suggest that the AMS review their disciplinary measures.

Save energy and a tree or two

Dear Editors,
Is energy the only resource of which the university and its members should be careful? One way or another, I have received in the past week, addressed or delivered individually, four copies of the programme for the Dunning Trust Lectures, for the Children's Cinema Series, and for A Renaissance Cultural Experience in the Weekend University (price $100.00). Anyone can see that there are a lot of trees in Canada; but there seemed to be a lot of energy not so long ago.

A little advice from the top

Dear Editors,
I would like to make a few preliminary comments on the issue of the Theatre Building Fund.

First, I would like to compliment Alan Mann on his feature article on this subject which appeared in last Friday's edition. It was an impressive piece of investigative reporting and Mr. Mann deserves credit for the obvious effort and research that went into writing it. I can only hope that this will start a new trend in the type of story that Journal reporters will be coming up with in the future.

I must, however, take exception with the editorial which appeared in Tuesday's edition on this same subject. The statement in your editorial that this issue is typical of the "inept" way in which the AMS represents students is grossly unfair. It has been my experience over the past seven years that I have attended this University, that the Executive of the AMS has done, at the very least, a credible job of protecting student interests and representing them to the University. This is evident in the AMS position on issues such as the University Centre, Bus-It and the AMS Response to the Principal's Report on Financial Constraints, to name only a few examples. I would certainly not suggest that we have been perfect in this regard, but I would submit that, considering that the members of the AMS are all students and that we are limited in our information on various topics, we have done a job that is worth fairer treatment than the blanket condemnation which you accorded this year's executive and our predecessors in your editorial.

Mr. Mann's article has raised very valid questions on this issue, ones which deserve answers from both the AMS and the University. If either group fails to provide those answers, then we deserve to be called to account to the students for our mistakes. Aside from this present issue, however, if the Journal editors have specific examples of how we have failed to represent student interests then let us hear what they are. Otherwise give us the opportunity to present our side before you pronounce your verdict.

Still time for true justice

Dear Editors,
Mark Lane's presentation (Tues. Jan. 27) of his evidence against the Warren Commission set up to investigate the assassination of President John F. Kennedy was very informative and inspiring.

Being a U.S. Citizen and having lived in the states at that time, I well remember that tragic day of November 22, 1963, and the confusing and contradictory years that followed. At times during Lane's presentation I was enraged by his ability to supply an overexaggerated and dramatic sense of humour to such a serious matter. Yet as he continued I became deeply moved and inspired by his obvious sincerity.

The most significant part of his discussion, I feel, was his reference to the fact that not since 1956, has the United States had a President who has been elected by the people. That is, there has not been since that time, an election where a prospective candidate has not been eliminated from the race by violent acts of assassination or assassination attempts, or has been placed in office by assignment. And that the country is to celebrate its Bicentennial with those twenty years directly preceding it, is definitely a consideration for serious thought.

Lane and all those who support his endeavours are to be commended for their efforts in attempting to re-establish the true justice that once existed in the United States.

Professors are the villains

Dear Editors,
As one of those who attended the all candidates' meeting on Tuesday night I was surprised and appalled to see that the people who will be leading our student government next year can discuss such issues as the atrocious standards of teaching in many departments, the absurd reduction in library hours or the extreme effort required to squeeze an extra $8,000 from the administration for Bus-It without seeing that these are manifestations of the same problem, i.e. that the university is run by the professors and for the professors. This university as it exists today is neither the tool of a grotesque capitalist conspiracy as the Socialist Slate would have it, nor is it a place of learning for students as the other candidates imply; it is simply a chummy club of would-be aristocrats who have happened to find themselves a "good thing"and who care about students only to the extent that they are needed to perpetrate the multi-million dollar fraud that supports the aristocratic lives of club members.

Vote early...and often!

Referendum:

CFRC, Legal Aid and Bus-it

CFRC

submitted by Steve Cutway and Thom Shand

The upcoming campus-wide referendum February 4th and 5th includes the following question: "Shall the 1975-76 student interest fee of twenty-five cents (per student), levied on behalf of the CFRC Sports Trust Fund to help finance the broadcasting of Queen's athletic activities, be continued annually?"

In the past, CFRC has broadcast all Golden Gael football games and as many hockey and basketball games as funds permitted. These broadcasts were made possible through private tax-deductible donations from interested students and student groups, Queen's faculty and staff, Queen's alumni and other listeners in Kingston and area. Funds were solicited through the annual campaign usually held in late September or early October. This method had its shortcomings. The main thrust of the canvass focussed on students living on campus. Because the canvassers were themselves student volunteers it was physically impossible to visit everyone in the Queen's community personally. Letters were sent to the various student societies and groups with about a 33 percent response. Some people found the idea of canvassing distasteful, as did some of those canvassed. Revenues were not sufficient to cover committed expenses. These commitments had to be made no later than mid-August, the date our programme schedule for the upcoming fall season had to be in the printer's hands. Thus the funding of sports broadcasts had a hand-to-mouth existence.

For these reasons, we felt that if sports broadcasts were to continue, the CFRC Sports Trust Fund should be put on a more definite and permanent basis. Because those students who gave voluntarily usually contributed no less than twenty-five cents, we proposed in early 1975 that the A.M.S. student interest fee be increased by the amount of twenty-five cents on our behalf for a one-year trial period. Due to circumstances beyond our control, we missed last February's campus-wide referendum; but approval was given for the increase at the A.M.S. Annual Meeting held in March.

Now we are asking for your support to continue the levy - and in doing so, point out that we are not asking for any increase but only that the twenty-five cent levy be continued.

The costs, particularly for away broadcasts - games which are played at locations other than Queen's - are considerable, approximately $250 each. This includes the installation and rental of telephone lines in each location, including George Richardson Stadium during the football season and R.M.C. when the Hockey Gaels must play at the Constantine because exams are in progress at the Jock Harty; long distance charges, which vary depending on the distance, time of day and length of broadcast (most broadcasts last between 2½ and 3 hours); travel expenses which also vary depending on the distance travelled; and meals. Very rarely is accommodation necessary. As well, special additional telephone equipment has been installed at CFRC which enables our telephone lines to be put on the air, which is necessary for you to hear the live play-by-play and colour commentary. The cost of this equipment is approximately $800 per annum, one third of which is borne by the sports fund. Costs increase significantly when a team makes the play-offs and travels to either the Maritimes or the western provinces. In 1970, for example, one play-off game in Winnipeg cost over $700 which by today's prices would be considerably more. Travel costs decrease somewhat when the broadcast crew can travel on a team bus. This is not possible during the football season becasuse of the large number of teamassociated personnel who must attend the games. Thus cars must be rented to transport the crew and equipment.

The costs related to sports broadcasts are considerable. As non-commercial stations, CFRC and CFRC-FM realize no revenue from any of our programming. In a commercial situation, advertisers' revenues would easily meet these costs.

If you enjoyed any or all of our broadcasts this season, if you have any interest in athletics at Queen's, or if you want to ensure the continuatin of sports broadcasts on CFRC, vote "Yes" in next week's referendum. With your support this year, we have had the most comprehensive broadcast schedule of Queen's athletic events in our history. We want this to continue and we hope you do too. Support the efforts of our volunteer student broadcasters by voting "Yes" in the referendum next Wednesday or Thursday. Remember, you're voting for a continuation of the levy at its present level, not an increase. Make your voice count.

Legal Aid

Submitted by Peter Wells

Among the items on the upcoming referendum is a request that Queen's Legal Aid be given an increase in student assistance from 25 cents per student to 75 cents per student.

In the past year the students of this university contributed about $3,400 of the $59,000 operating budget of Queen's Legal Aid. If this increase were granted, no more grants would be sought from Outer Council. If it is assumed that 9,000 students will pay activity fees in the fall this would mean that the student contribution would be about $6,800. This would amount to eleven percent of the Legal Aid operating budget for one year. The bulk of the budget is spent on office expenses and from September to May the programme is staffed by unpaid student volunteers.

In the past year Queen's Legal Aid has expended its services significantly. The caseload is up 35 percent partly due to increased use of our services by students with housing problems. Twice during 1975 special task forces were established to deal with widespread landlord-tenant problems. The second group is dealing solely with rent control legislation and the legality of schemes of certain landlords. Student demand has also increased as a result of the move of our office from the basement of MacDonald Hall to the main corridor leading to Mac Corry. To service this demand it has been necessary to have a student on duty full time.

The generous support of the students has in the past been a significant factor in obtaining funds from other sources such as the City of Kingston. Not only does this support result in a service for the benefit of university students it also permits Legal Aid to provide service in Belleville and Kingston and the north of Frontenac County. The service is valuable to these people as some do not have access to lawyers. It also serves to enhance the reputation of Queen's students in general. Your vote in favour of the increase will help us to continue to provide these services.

Bus-it

During the next few years the cost of education will increase dramatically. Much of that burden, rightly or wrongly, will be placed on the university student. The recommendation of the Council of University Presidents for a 25 percent increase in tuition is example enough.

As students it is important that we set priorities. It is important that we carry a share of that burden, but not an undue share. Certain areas are clearly not our sole responsibility and Bus-it is one of them.

The Principal, after considerable hesitation, has agreed to a 60-40 (student-university) cost-split for 1976-77. He has, however, guaranteed no such ratio for future years, arguing that more and more of the cost of the transportation system must be borne by the student. This is clearly unfair.

Every major university with separate campuses operates a university-subsidized shuttle service. Not to do so places an enormous financial burden on the student whose day involves travel between those two campuses. (In the case of an arts student living at West Campus an additional $125 is in order). Second, the university has a responsibility to ensure the safety of its students travelling between those two points. Walking from Douglas Library to McArthur at midnight is certainly not one of your more pleasant experiences. Third, the university has a responsibility to the city to ensure that the downtown core is not entirely student-populated, engulfed in a housing situation not amenable to healthy relations.

The point is not a possible eight-five cent increase, but rather that the increase will take place in an area which is clearly not the sole responsibility of the student body. In order to maintain some semblance of priority, voting for a definite 50-50 split is essential. Where we go from there will be up to the Principal to decide

Referendum:

Tricolor

The Tricolor levy has not risen since 1971, when the fee of $4.50 was incorporated into the student fees paid automatically with tuition. Costs have risen astronomically since then. The basic price of the book has risen over six thousand dollars in the past three years, and further, substantial cost increases are predicted by our printer, when the pulp and paper strike is settled. Photographic supplies (film, chemicals and paper) have also increased in cost. This year the book will run at a slight loss, which will be covered by the A.M.S. To break even next year it is estimated that we need at least $1.00 more from each student. $1.50 allows for the extras, such as colour, that everyone likes to see. The alternative is to reduce the quality, size and content of the book. Vote to raise the Tricolor levy and help maintain a worthwhile tradition.

Honoraria

Honoraria is not a payment for a job but merely compensation for benefits foregone. An individual involved with extra-curricular activities at Queen's often can not carry a full academic course load and as a result must attend school during intercession and summer school. As a result, often valuable time, which could be spent earning money from a summer job, is taken up. For most individuals, this means financial hardship and the possibility of not returning to school.

One of the issues on tomorrow's and Thursday's referendum proposes increases in honoraria for many of more time consuming positions in extra-curricular activities at Queen's. Without the proposed increases many of these positions will become only available to a select few, those of copious wealth. For the student who supports himself, these activities will be beyond his grasp.

If this situation is allowed to continue, who is to blame and who will suffer? The answer is you, you will make the extra-curricular activities at Queen's the realm of the financially elite and you will turn away some of the finest student leaders Queen's may ever experience. Do yourself a favour and vote to increase honoraria.

For the more economically minded student, here is one for your hat collection: the last time the honoraria for many of the student positions was increased, - that of the Queen's Journal in particular - was 1938.

Two other very important honoraria questions are included on the ballot. Part two of the honoraria questions asks whether honoraria should be awarded retroactively to March 1, 1975. If this legislation is passed the students involved this year will receive the increased honoraria. If you feel the student leaders this year are deserving, vote yes to this question.

The third question on the honoraria issue is whether or not AMS Outer Council, your group of elected representatives, should have the authority to change honoraria through constitutional amendments. This would allow Outer Council to monitor honoraria for student positions.

On Wednesday and Thursday, vote yes to all three honoraria questions. If you give a damn for the people who work for you to provide all the services Queen's enjoys, vote YES.

Commerce Society

two race for top and three for second spot

Steven Lougheed for President

Commerce has the people and the resources to be one of the most active faculties at Queen's. It is apparent, though, that in order to realize our potential as a faculty, we must have a strong cohesive Commerce Society and executive. The faculty has capability to do more for its members, especially in educational and career oriented areas. As president, I would work particularly for the development of the Commerce brain trust, and would like to help initiate a lecture series in career opportunities and placement In addition, I would work toward the further development of the social programmes of the Society

My understanding of the workings of the society and its problems, through my position with the Orientation program, and through three years of immediate contact with present and former executives, gives me confidence that I would be able to capable perform the duties of president. It is my sincere desire to initiate active progress in the Commeree Society.

Most important is my willingness to spend the time necessary to do the job thoroughly. My desire is not to predominate in the society but th help give it direction.

I would urge you to attend the candidates meeting in order to become more familiar with the candidates for all positions and their plans for the Society.

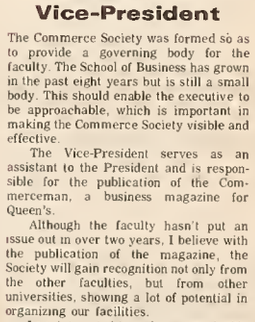
Tim Runge for President

The Commerce Society can hardly be referred to as an organization involved in controversial activities and issues as part of its day to day activities We cannot, however, overlook the fact that contentious issues are not of a primary concern to the Society. For this reason, I believe, the Commerce Society and its proceedings are rarely felt with great impact upon the members of the student body, although important functions are continuously occurring. These are functions that concern the students, but unfortunately are seldom heard of.

Most of us know that the Society exists, but how many know or realize what it in fact does? Too many people know too little about the Commerce Society and its executive The Society must, therefore, first be felt throughout Dunning Hall among the students and staff, and secondly, throughout the campus by the students and staff of the other faculties

Communications between the society, executive and students must be improved to a more satisfactory level; once that is achieved, this communication must be maintained. The entire executive must be made readily available to the students in order to provide friendly and efficient assistance and guidance with respect to all matters which might arise.

Only strong and decisive leadership can control and direct the Commerce Society towards the attainment of these goals.



Ron Butler for Vice-President

The Commerce Society was formed so as to provide a governing body for the faculty. The School of Business has grown in the past eight years but is still a small body. This should enable the executive to be approachable, which is important in making the Commerce Society visible and effective.

The Vice-President serves as an assistant to the President and is responsible for the publication of the Commerceman, a business magazine for Queen's.

Although the faculty hasn't put an issue out in over two years, I believe with the publication of the magazine, the Society will gain recognition not only from the other faculties, but from other universities, showing a lot of potential in organizing our facilities.

I am interested in and concerned with the direction of the Commerce Society and as Vice-President would like to serve on the Society.

Mike Kehoe for Vice-President

I believe that the two most important facets of the position of Vice-President on Commerce Society are approachability and involvement. Only a person who is committed to giving his utmost in both these areas should be elected to the Vice-Presidency.

I am willing to devote as much of my time as is possible to getting involved in the policies and long-term objectives of society. By this I mean explaining in depth the possibilities of a Commerce pub, improvements on the Commerceman, the publication of the Society, and an upgrading of the communication structure at Commerce student government.

I would desire a Society that is not only involved, but open and approachable. Commerce students should have the right to know about the Society's actions and decisions They should also have easy access to a member of society to which they can make suggestions or complaints if they so desire. The Commerce Society should not be a dark government which does not make its policies and actions known. As Vice-President, I am willing to be active in channeling the student voice to the Society.

Having participated in many varied events around the campus, I feel I have a good grip on the working of these events and an ability to work with the people who are responsible for them. This is of utmost importance in the transformation of ideas into action and problems into decisions.

I hope you will consider these two objectives which I hope to accomplish as Vice-President: involvement and approachability. I am willing to put forth my best effort in both.

Greg Lowes for Vice-President

The Commerce Society is involved in a number of varied functions, including Student - Faculty relations, Community Involvement, direct input into the AMS and OFS, and of course - Social Events.

A coordinated effort is needed from the executive to carry out these functions in the most beneficial way. I wish to be part of this effort, as your Vice-President.

This position entails organising these activities and initiating new policies. My experience as Commerce '77 President this year, and my involvement in setting up the Student-Faculty Committee have served to keep me in touch with the key issues and the people involved.

During the 1974-75 year the position of Chief Boss-Orientation Committee and duties as Central Committee Chairman-Gordon House got me acquainted with members of all years of the Society and opened up many contacts with university officials.

Now, I welcome a place on the Commerce Society Executive, and would strive towards resurrecting the Commerceman, gaining more student voice in Academic decisions and more social events at both the year and society levels.

By staying on top of what's going on at Queen's and personal involvement with the issues at hand, I believe my input can be worthwhile. But I need your support. VOTE GREG LOWES, VICE-PRESIDENT, COMMERCE SOCIETY.

Senior Reps to AMS

Don Langill Sr. AMS Rep

In my first two years at Queen's I was involved quite extensively with athletics and residence activities. Now, I would like to get involved at the university level. I feel that the Commerce Society needs a good liaison with the A.M.S. and I am willing to devote the time necessary to do the job. I want to get involved with campus activities and help to voice a strong opinion as representative of my faculty. I believe that the O.F.S. should be supported in their fight against the McKeough-Henderson report. The projected increase in tuition fees is more than is necessary. As a student living off campus, one of my main concerns is the housing situation. Students are not well enough informed. Are the rents justified? (A study should be done.) As Commerce rep., I will inform the A.M.S. of the importance of Bus-It to Queen's students and the unity of Queen's. Without the entire forty percent subsidy from the university, the students will be forced to bear, what should be, a university problem. Students need representation and a voice to communicate their ideas. I feel that if I am given this opportunity, my enthusiasm and concern can help me to do this job effectively.

Jeff Myers Sr. AMS Rep

The primary purpose of the A.M.S. is to provide services to its members and represent students in their formal dealings with the University. To fulfil these goals there must be strong representation from all of the existing faculties. The A.M.S. needs our ideas and our support for they can not and do not have all the answers to all the problems. Therefore a greater concentration on the flow of information from the students to their representatives and from their representatives to the A.M.S. is essential. In the past, these communications have been sorely neglected resulting in an uninformed student population.

The alleviation of this problem is the primary responsibility of the Commerce Senior A.M.S. representative. I will need your help, your ideas and your support for without these I would not be your representative.

Therefore it is to these ends that I will endeavour to represent Commerce in the best interest of its members on both the Outer Council and its subsidiary committees.

The A.M.S. thrives on students willing to offer their expertise and practical experience. The A.M.S. is your government. Support it and vote on February 4th and 5th.

George Thwaites Sr. AMS Rep

On February 4th and 5th the election of next year's A.M.S. executive will take place. On the same days, a Commerce Senior A.M.S. Representative will be elected to work with the newly elected exeeutive and to represent the Commerce faculty on the Outer Counell. I would like to be that Rep

In the year and a half that I have been here I've come to realize that the major reason for the lack of interest in A.M.S. activities is not "apathy", but a lack of communication. This year has been an improvement over last year, with both the A.M.S. and the Commerce Society becoming more visible. I would like to be able to help continue this improvement as I believe that if people don't know what is going on that they'll be unable to voice an opinion.

My experience here at Queen's has included the positions of: Outing Club Chairman (1974-75), Morris Hall Residence Chairman, Secretary Treasurer of the Inter Residence Council, Representative to the Residence Board, Commerce Orientation '76 Committee Chairman and a Boss in Orientation '75.

I would like the chance to serve in the A.M.S. as a Representative of the Commerce Society and therefore I need your vote. On February 4th and 5th get out and vote, and, if you feel so inclined VOTE GEORGE THWAITES, COMMERCE SENIOR A.M.S. REP.

Athletic Stick, Secretary Acclaimed

Ross Fraser Athletic Stick

Since coming to Queen's 3 years ago, I have been highly involved in the men's intramural athletic program. For the past 2 years I have been Bews stick for Commerce '77 and now feel the Faculty position would be a good challenge. I think I have the experience necessary to do the job as I know the Bews system inside out. The name of the game in Bews is fortification: you don't have to be good at a sport to have fun at it. I would like to further convey this message to the Commerce students. A main problem lies in the organization of first year students. It takes a while to learn how the Bews program works and I would like to work closely with the first year stick and help him get his year organized. Also I am presently working on the Ontario Universities Commerce Hockey Tournament which is being held here at Queen's in a few weeks. This type of competition is great and I would like to ensure that it continues next year. All in all, I am very interested in doing the job

Joanne Brooks Secretary

The position of secretary for the Commerce Society is not a particularly enthusiastic job, and it is therefore difficult to submit an enthusiastic job, and it is therefore difficult to submit an enthusiastic campaign platform. The functions of the secretary are mainly informing people of the meetings, recording the minutes and correspondence. I feel the position is definitely a responsible one however, and particularly important in maintaining good communications among members of the Commerce Society

I am hoping that through my participation in the Commerce Society, by being involved in the decisions and activities, I will be able to contribute towards making next year a good one.

Junior Commerce reps to AMS

Janet Longmore
Jr. AMS rep

Hi! I am Janet Longmore, a first year Commerce student. This year, I am secretary-treasurer of the Commerce '79 Society and I am presently running for the position of Jr. AMS representative for the Commerce Society Executive.

I feel it is very important for students in all faculties of the university to be aware of relevant issues that arise concerning our education. Through attendance at AMS meetings, representing the first and second Commerce years, I feel I would then be able to communicate these various issues to the members of the commerce faculty. I feel there is a slight lack of communication of information and I am anxious to try and bridge that communication gap.

I am willing to listen to and present any opinions or suggestions from the Commerce Society to the AMS and to take the time needed to be present at all meetings.

Lynton Hurdman
Jr. AMS rep

In the past, Commerce students have proven to be the most vocal and concerned faculty on campus. We have been instrumental in the formation of society and university policy. It is important that we continue to remain as vocal and as influential for it is up to the students to maintain our existing high educational standards and student services. Without strong, responsible and credible student input these goals cannot be maintained. Your representatives can be instrumental in two important areas: 1) the Outer Council of the AMS, and 2) the Faculty Board and Student Faculty Committee. The Outer Council formulates and implements all decisions concerning student services (eg: Pub, Bus-it, the Journal, typing). Since these affect students everyday it is necessary that your representative work so you, the students, obtain the utmost benefits possible. On the society level, Commerce representatives play an important role in influencing the quality and type of education students will receive. The Student-Faculty Committee offers students a chance to voice their views, to work together with the faculty, and to improve the undergraduate programme.

Your representatives are responsible for much more than the formal education offered Commerce is a close-knit, friendly society and it is important that we continue to remain so. The executive sponsors many social (Stag!, Formal) and cultural (Commerceman, Lecture Series) events often using your yearly fee of $7.50. Therefore it is up to you, the students, to ensure these monies are spent efficiently and wisely.

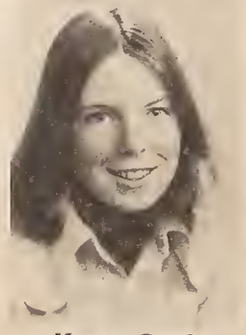
Remember the Commerce executive are your representatives. They are responsible to each and every one of the students in the faculty. Elect a responsible person, someone who can do the job and do it effectively. Vote Lynton Hurdman!

Chris Jones
Jr. AMS rep

Chris Jones! What does he represent? Being a first year student, I have experienced the orientation into Queen's as a whole. I am constantly impressed by certain student participation and awareness. It happens. My interest in student government has increased due to the activities of the AMS. However, there exists a communication gap between this governing student body and the commerce students. I have long had an interest in student government, and feel that I qualify for the position of Junior AMS representative. I hope to bring to the attention of the Queen's Student the potential we have for change. Through me, your ideas will not go unheard. I hope to represent your ideas and keep you informed of what the student government is planning. My interests are your interests, I will always act in the best of our interests. Vote for Chris Jones.

Julie Buzza
Jr. AMS rep

My name is Julie Buzza and I am running for the position of Junior AMS representative for the Commerce Society. The AMS is the student government which is an intricate and vital part of Queen's University. It is my feeling that a ruling body must reflect the ideals and opinions of the student body.



The role of the junior AMS is to voice the views and concerns of the students, specifically the Commerce Society. I feel the student government is only as good as its members, and in turn, each member is only as good as his or her supporters.

Although I am entering this election with no specific platform or aims, I like to think of my position as open and available to good ideas and worthwhile criticisms. I would like to present myself as an instrument through which you can make suggestions and decisions which affect your life at Queen's as well as your successors.

With your help we can strengthen the ties between the student body, namely the Commerce Society, and the Government.

Remember the government depends on us, so get out and support it. Begin by voting, but don't let it stop there. Be heard, let your representative represent you and your ideas.

Senate position contested

Karen Croft
for Senate

The Senate develops, co-ordinates and integrates wise academic policies for the University. As a member of the Senate, I am willing to give my time and effort to contribute knowledgeable criticism of the methods and aims of academic policies on behalf of the student body.

The efficiency of the Senate depends on the active participation of its members and their personal involvement in the core network of this university. It is essential that this channel of academic decisions be developed to a greater degree to provide better co-ordinaton between the student needs and university policies.

I feel that my experience as Social Convenor for Commerce '78 ('74-'75) a member of the Commerce Orientation Committee and a Boss, and Secretary of the Commerce Society ('75-'76), has adequately prepared me to hold a position in which I may act as a liaison between students and the administration.

Through my contributions in the Senate, I intend to further the respect that the administration has developed for the student viewpoint

Nicol MacNichol
for Senate

The Senate is involved in many important decisions affecting the Queen's community which range from academic issues to campus planning. The student body in the past has not been properly informed about the affairs the Senate is considering. Without student opinions, it is hard for the Senators to synthesize the student views in the decision they are making.

I would like to get the students more interested in the affairs of the Senate so that I could represent their interests more effectively. In the past I have participated in University activities. I am an AMS constable. I was a boss in the Commerce '75 Orientation Week and I am a member of the AMS Speaker's Committee. In these activities I have been able to meet most of the Commerce students and I feel that this would enable me to be a good representative for them on the Senate.

Commerce

For Social Convenor

Louella Lachance
Social Convenor

In running for the position of social convenor, I feel that I would be bringing into the Commerce Society a number of years of valuable organizational experience. During my high school years, I actively participated in Students' Council, occupying several executive positions. Last year, I spent a great deal of time working with the governing student body at Carleton University. Although the governing system is different there, I feel this is a definite plus.

I realize this position will be no easy task, but I'm willing to give up the time and effort for it. I'd like the chance to participate and I feel that I possess the necessary qualifications to bring about a number of creative and enjoyable social functions.

Mark Hayes
Social Convenor

The Social Convenor of Commerce has a wide variety of duties, including coordination of individual year's activities, organization of society events such as the formal and the Commerce banquet, and acting as a source person for individuals within Commerce who would like to help with events or merely find out what's going on. I believe I have the qualifications to perform these duties with distinction. As Social Convenor for Commerce '77 this year I have organized a number of large events (football pubs, Suds and Cinema, and the upcoming Queen's table hockey tournament) and while doing so have established a large number of vital contacts within both the student body and the university administration. I would like your vote to give me the chance to offer a more varied and exciting slate of social events for Commerce students next year.

For Treasurer

Cathy Culliton
Treasurer

On Feb. 4 and 5, you will be called upon to elect a new Commerce Society executive. I would like your vote as treasurer. I am a member of Commerce '78 and in the past have served as an Economics DSC.

I feel the Commerce Society should take a more active role on campus. Student involvement is a must for this to come about, but for students to be involved, they must be aware. I feel there is a need for better communication between the Commerce Society and the students which it represents.

As a member of the executive of the Commerce Society, working with the other executive members, I would work towards this end.

I am willing and able to take on the responsibilities of this position. Please give me your support on February 4 and 5. Vote Cathy Culliton for treasurer

Dave Jeffrey
Treasurer

The Queen's Commerce Society has an annual budget of six thousand dollars. This is a significant sum by any standards and warrants responsible and competent administration. David Jeffery possesses the honesty and conscientious nature required to take on this responsibility. Although a novice to politics at Queen's, David's no stranger to accounting and money management. He is prepared to take on an important commitment within the Commerce Society, you can be a part of that commitment by voting David Jeffrey for Treasurer on February 4th and 5th.

Aesculapian Society

Michael Loughlan

Margaret Churcher
Meds Rehab
Senator

I think that one of the main responsibilities of a Student Senator, or in fact anyone aspiring to that position, is to acquaint people with the functions of the Senate as well as to increase awareness of the consequences of any actions of this body. According to Senate Documents 1975-76, the primary role of the Senate is to "determine all matters of an academic character which affect the University as a whole, and to be concerned with all matters which affect the welfare of the University." Having served on the Senate Committee on Academic Development (SCAD)--the committee responsible for advising Senate on all matters regarding the establishing of new programmes, maintaining of academic quality and negotiating with external bodies such as the Ontario Council of University Affairs (OCUA)--as well as having attended both Senate meetings and Student Senators Caucus meetings for the past year, I feel more than adequately prepared to meet the challenge of being your Student Senator. Having also spent the last four and one half years at Queen's I think that I have become well acquainted with a large number of people in both the Faculty of Medicine and the School of Rehabilitation Therapy and that this should also stand me in good stead.

Hoping for your vote and, if not, at least your participation in the election on Wednesday, February 4th

ASUS exec acclaimed

In recent years, A.S.U.S. has enjoyed a rather unique and decentralized organizational structure. The benefits of such a structure have been reiterated during every election and by-election, but we must now realize that the links which hold together the present structure are tenuous at best. When talking about strengthening and increasing lines of communication, as is often the case in campus elections, the difficulty of achieving such noble but equally elusive aims must be fully appreciated.

Within the internal structure of A.S.U.S. itself, we propose to improve communications between various components of A.S.U.S. The degree of autonomy which was given the D.S.C.'s with the release of course evaluation guide funds last year must be encouraged to a greater extent than was done during 1975-76. A.S.U.S. will not only provide its financial support for the guides and other activities, but will compile a comprehensive resource book for course evaluation to place at the disposal of the D.S.C.'s.

Artsci Council is an appropriate place to discuss not only those issues which concern the rather large spectrum of university and society, but also to gain consensus on issues, such as A.M.S. internal and external affairs policy, which are of direct concern to those students whom we wish to represent. Above all, we would like to offer A.M.S. Outer Council a reasoned, critical evaluation of all policies which affect Arts and Science students at Queen's.

Bob White
President

We feel that we can bring considerable and varied experience to the positions. Bob White is a sociology and philosophy major and is presently a 2 yr. A.S.U.S. representative to the A.M.S., a member of Elrond Council, and has been a member of the A.M.S. committee to investigate money-raising programs and the A.M.S.

Brian Young

committee on cooperatives. Brian Young is a history major and is currently Treasurer for A.S.U.S. He has previously been both a member (73-74) and President (74-75) of the Artsci 77 Executive. In addition he is a member of the Academic Orientation Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Senate race two compete two acclaimed

one-year term

Financial constraint is not a temporary phenomenon and the economic prosperity, which not only universities but Canadians, in general, experienced during the sixties, will not return. The university must plan its present and future policies in light of a changing Canadian and, indeed, a changing global economy. The effects of government cutbacks to the universities are being felt by both students and faculty alike as classes get larger, equipment diminished, library standards deteriorate, and so on. We would protest and are protesting this government policy. But the university will continue to be faced with severe cutbacks and, with difficulty, must set its priorities.

Clearly, students can make a valuable input into the establishment of these priorities. The AMS Report on Financial Constraint is an attempt to deal with the problems facing the university. The Senate also plays a significant role. It is perhaps the most important governing body of the University because it is comprised of both faculty and students. Through a system of standing committees, the Senate attempts to deal with all matters, particularly academic, which affect the University as a whole.

The standing committee which interests me the most is that of Appointment, Promotion, Tenure, and Leave (SCAPTAL). The issues it deals with are difficult, but are the ones which directly affect the quality of our education. Similarly, I am interested in the Library Committee and the Academic Development Committee (SCAD) for their concerns surely encompass the most vital affairs of the university. It is important that, as students, we take an active role in promoting the quality and opportunity of education that Canadians have enjoyed in the past.

Tony Pepper,
one-year term

You know I really am well-suited for the position. My experience is quite invaluable, and I do possess a wealth of information. I have sat on so many committees these last three years that I now consider myself a standing authority on the many niceties and not-so-niceties of university life.

Unfortunately my experience has recently proven to be so invaluable, my wealth of knowledge and information so rich that there is scarce little market for it outside these hallowed walls.

And so I have decided to run for senator. It seems the only reasonable thing to do upon entering my fourth year is to reinvest my interests back into the system, in hope of reaping a more lucrative return not just for myself, but for all concerned.

"Yet I make no promises. I am not a politician. I am a bureaucrat, an organizer of events; a researcher; a committee member. Let those practitioners of "the art of the possible" pre-conclude and promise. I offer no guarantees. I can only do as good a job as can possibly be done. Nothing more, but nothing less.

But what recommendations do I have? Three years of experience from being:
- a D.S.C. rep. for 4 different courses ('73-'74 and '74-'75)
- D.S.C. Chairman, History ('75-'76)
- Faculty Board Rep., History ('75-'76)
- the undergraduate on the Selection Committee for a New Chairman for the Department of History
- a gael ('74)
- Social-Cultural Convenor for the A.S.U.S. Orientation Committee ('75)

and the Lord knows what else. I have not done everything and I have undoubtedly neglected doing much more. But this is all I have to offer. Upon these recommendations, my friends, I let your judgment fall.

To provide effective representation, the student senator must be willing to dedicate the necessary time and effort to ensure that he-she is fully aware of current issues facing the Senate. He-she should also have a broad and sensitive understanding of university life to be capable of realizing the implications of these issues not only to the student, but also to the university and the community. I have listed my background above to show you that I have both a variety of experience and a true interest in most student affairs. Hopefully my past has been diversified enough to enable me to convey a viewpoint drawn from a wide cross-section of student opinion.

Some old, new faces are in the race

Ross Bartlett

Over the next few years there will be a need for universities to make some drastic changes. As the largest faculty, Arts and Science has the right and the duty to play a part in those changes here at Queen's.

We have, in the AMS, a potential for a strong, viable student government. This task will take people with the interest, ability and above all the faith to make the system work over a number of years.

Issues that will come under question in the near future will vary from AMS supprt of the OFS, to library quality, to the form of student government. At the present time, the major problem with the AMS is one of communication. As your ASUS representative it would be my job to get your ideas to Outer Council. There must be more to student government than organizing concerts.

As a first year student I can't present a long list of chairmanships of impressive committees. This year I've done a lot of work on student affairs for the Journal and served on the DSC for Philosophy. Coupled with past experiences and my personal interest and long-term commitment to the position and this University, I believe I have the necessary abilities to represent you well.

So show an interest Artsci's. Make a choice and then express that choice by voting for the candidate you feel can do the best job. I am prepared to devote the time and effort to doing such a job

Susan Bentley

Apathy seems to be an all too common phenomenon on the Queen's campus. I would like to see a more informed and interested student body; one which cares not only about the present situation but also that of future students. Most students are hardly aware of the vital role the A.M.S. plays in their day to day existence. For anyone attending the recent "Meet the Candidates" Night for the A.M.S. Executive, it is clear there are many important issues which confront students not only here at Queen's but everywhere. If students are not prepared to take a part in their welfare why should anyone else? It is through the students and their participation that such issues as the housing problem, tuition increases, quality of education, and accessibility will be solved or at least considered.

Queen's offers one of the best possible learning environments for a total education. It is a privilege which should not be taken for granted. I believe each student has an obligation to give in return his or her best no matter how great or small that may be. It may be an old cliche but one which holds true in this case - you only get out of something that which you put in. One way to help initiate that belief is to get myself involved in the university and its functions . By understanding its workings and procedures the possibility for expanding awareness may be realized. I hope you will allow me that chance by giving me your vote on Feb. 4th and 5th. Thank you.

Hugh Christie

The faculty of Arts and Science is the largest faculty on campus. Due to both their large numbers and the variety of departments they fall into, the students are as diverse a group as will be found anywhere. It is this diversity which makes adequate representation to the university as a whole such a crucial link. The responsibilities connected with the position of Arts and Science representative to the AMS Outer Council are such that they require the rep to spend a considerable amount of time both in keeping in touch with opinions and interests within the faculty and in adequately preparing the presentation of those interests to the AMS. The job, more than anything else, demands that the person care about what he or she is doing, care enough to devote the time and energy to insure the job gets done well.

Being a frosh, I have not got a long list of impressive sounding prior appointments to ream off for you. I have been vice-president of Artsci '79 and a member of ASUS interyear committee since September. About the only thing I can push is interest and energy. In schoolwork, you always do best in the courses you like the most. In a position such as this one, you only do a good job if you are genuinely interested in doing a good job. I am.

There is my case, then, elect me and I will devote the time and energy necessary to assure that the faculty of Arts and Science receives good, strong representation on Outer Council, and I will more than justify the confidence you place in me. Thank you.

Sarah Edinborough

On October 16, 1975 I was elected to the position of A.S.U.S. Rep to the Outer Council for a one year term. The election was a by-election to fill 3 positions on Outer Council and as such, it elected me to the position of A.S.U.S. Rep to the A.M.S. for 3½ months. In that time I have become much better acquainted with the functions and the issues of the A.M.S. and it is for that reason that I am seeking election to the same position in the Feb. election. The A.M.S. is a multi-faceted and it takes a while to become knowledgeable about the various functions which it serves, and the issues which face it. With 3 months experience of the Arts and Science Undergraduate society for the duration of the 1976-77 term.

The issues which face the A.M.S. range from a possible increase in the level of student financing of Bus-it to protesting the McKeough Henderson Report. I see the A.M.S. as a body which can understand, sympathize and serve the interests of the students at Queen's. Right now universities in Ontario are in a state of financial flux because of Financial Constraints and the McKeough Henderson report on post secondary education. The A.M.S. has put out its own report on Financial Constraints and I think that it is very important that the students have a definite influence on the future quality of their education. We must do our best to retain a standard of excellence at Queen's without relying heavily on students for funding. I agree with the O.F.S. that students must fight an increase of tuition fees and abolition of bursaries in favor of loans which would make it financially implausible for some to attend university. On the other hand I did not attend the Mass Rally in Toronto because I personally question the usefulness of confrontation politics. I think that students must get together and submit feasible alternatives to the Henderson Report which is not too idealized for it to be realized.

I see the A.M.S. as a body which serves the students from providing housing and day care to lectures. I have experience in other fields at Queen's as an English D.S.C. and past social convenor of Artsci '78, as well as being a gael A.S.U.S. Orientation '75. All of these positions as well as my own personal outside interests have brought me to a greater awareness of what is vital to the quality of education and of life here at Queen's. For these reasons I would like to ask your support in the election to continue in the position of ASUS Rep to the AMS for the 1 year term February 1976-1977.

ASUS reps for AMS

Rod Hinton

The AMS Outer Council needs people who will represent the interests of their respective faculties honestly and with sincerity. ASUS representatives to the AMS have perhaps a harder job than others on Outer Council of representing the diverse interests that fall under the ASUS umbrella. The society needs a group of representatives who will not only reflect their society's needs but will voice their own views when they are needed. Because I bring a varied experience of both arts and science courses, I feel I can gage more accurately the attitudes of both the "Arts" and "Science" sectors of ASUS that all too often remain emotionally apart from each other.

I disagree with the OFS stand that tuition fees be eliminated. If they must be raised, all efforts should be made to reduce that increase to a minimum. Certainly the Henderson Report's suggested fee increase of 66 percent is intolerable.

I feel that the AMS and Queen's students could mobilize their energies and their money, to affect government policy, much better if they lobbied directly with the government. Rallies will not serve this purpose.

The university should be firmly urged to increase its contribution to Bus-It. By removing its support from the program on a proportional basis, to a dollar value per student, the university has allowed itself a means of lowering its proportional contribution if costs rise in the future.

Queen's needs a strong student government. That strength rests with those in the AMS who can provide direction when it is needed most, at a time when all sectors of the university are under pressure to compromise their standards in the face of economic pressure. Yes, strong leadership is needed, however, it must not be allowed to concentrate in Inner Council. It is indeed a challenge, but it is a worthy one I am willing to tackle.

Deb McGuire

"Sex" and "Get Off Your Butts". The first is to get your attention; the second is a plea for help and the theme of last Tuesday's all-candidates' meeting.

Having spent over a year at Queen's, I realize that those people who feel they have the time to devote to student government, should become motivated enough to stand up and speak, rather than sit and complain.

The term "apathy" has been used so often at Queen's that it's lost its meaning; we've even become apathetic about apathy. The fact that John Gray became so overburdened with work this year that he could no longer maintain his studies, is deplorable.

This situation can only be resolved through serious and enthusiastic involvement. Consequently, that is my goal - to find out what I can do to ease the burden at the top, and to work towards greater awareness and participation among Queen's students in their affairs.

Lyn Royce

Since my nomination for ASUS rep to the AMS for one year term I've been doing a great deal of thinking about why I would be suitable for the position. As a first year student I believe I have enough time to devote to the problems presented. I also feel that because of the amount of time I will be able to spend dealing with ASUS and the AMS I can learn what really happens in Queen's student government. Subsequently, I will be able to report to the student body of the Arts and Science Faculty exactly what the various platforms are on critical issues.

Some of the critical issues that will affect the Queen's student body drastically are the McKeough-Henderson Report, an issue that will affect the students of 1977-78, the new housing shortage, and the new decision by the university to terminate the contracts of more professors than normal, due to financial reasons.

In short, then, I feel that I would be a very capable ASUS rep to the AMS. I know that I have the perseverence to remain active as a representative for the full year. Should I be elected I am positive that you will be satisfied with my work.

Ian McNeil

The AMS is the most accessible and representative body in student government at Queen's. It has in the past and should continue in future to make its voice heard and its presence felt on issues of vital concern to students. The AMS should vehemently oppose any provincial programs which impose unfair burdens upon students or adversely affect the quality of educations. The AMS should continue to stand firm on issues such as Bus-it and carry only its fair share of such costs.

The AMS should also continue its policy of inviting greater input from the students at large into the student government by encouraging greater interest in Outer Council meetings. It should also continue to create various committees on which students other than the small group elected to office can sit.

In the past year I have been on two such committees. One of these studying student-participation in university government has given me a great insight into how the government of Queen's functions on various levels. With this knowledge and experience I propose to do my part, if elected, to ensure that the AMS and ASUS continue to represent the interests of all Queen's students as fully as possible

Danny Peart

I believe strongly in the power of collective action and if elected I will try to strengthen the communications between student senators, faculty societies, and the AMS Representatives. A co-ordinated student effort could be particularly significant in such crucial areas as campus planning, tenure policy, and the quality of education. We must work together to tackle these and other major problems that are facing the university today. Only through a concerted effort can we expect our opinions to carry enough clout to have any impact on major decisions and resulting policies.

As a senator I would participate in discussions with zeal and prudence to present your interests to the best of my abilities. Vote Peart - accessible, responsible, and hardworking representation at the Senate level.

Thank You.

Leslie Gaukrodger

SENATE (acclaimed)

The Senate plays an important role in determining the policies and directions taken in many facets of campus life. Its interests encompass academic and curriculum development, financial planning, admission policies, and service operations. All of these aspects should be of concern to University students at Queen's.

The Faculty of Arts and Science is a large and diverse body of students. For this reason, an extra effort is required on the part of its representatives to search out the feelings and opinions of the students. I believe that I could provide the kind of diligent and accessible representation that the Society required.

In the past, the Senate has been regarded by many students as a distant, aloof body-out-of-touch with student attitudes. It would be my objective to change this negative outlook.

Having served as Secretary of ASUS this past year, and served on several committees, I feel that I have some understanding of the problems and interests of Arts and Science students. As well, I have written several articles for the Journal, was a Gael, a Proctor and a DSC Rep.

I feel that my range of experience would facilitate the flow of ideas and opinions between the students and staff of Queen's University.

ASUS reps to AMS

through the OFS - the provincial legislature. This power must be used for the protection of the students largest and most important interest - that of their education. How much, or how little for that matter, can we tolerate? Greater time and energy must be spent on the issues that really matter.

Rising tuition, the tenure issue, ill-equipped lab facilities, T.V. monitored courses and the GRANT-LOAN ratio, which if given lower priority will make Queen's into another "run of the mill" institution.

The AMS must re-evaluate its policy in these areas, strengthen its commitment in the issues that are in the student's greatest interest and energetically work towards a higher quality of education, for all in all realms.

Aside from the provision of services, the AMS must look at this as their main objective and treat it as such.

Tim Turner

(Acclaimed) 2 yr.

The opportunity of filling in as an interim A.S.U.S. representative in October was of great benefit. It has provided valuable insights into campus issues, people contacts, a general awareness outside the academic realm; and the participation in an organization which is of great benefit to Queen's students. This initiation period has provided me with the background I know I can now use to increase my effectiveness as well as my contributions to the AMS for the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society (ASUS).

The idea of the AMS as a service - providing body is generally well accepted by students at large. However one must also realize that the AMS with 10,000 members has the potential influence to effect legislative bodies, i.e. the Senate, or

Anthony Wood

Here at Queen's it is clear that a closer relationship between the AMS student government and the student body is needed.

In order to ensure that those who are supposedly representing student interest are really doing so, the AMS will have to become an institution which people really feel will respond to their demands. It must not become a clique - a small exclusive group - constantly living somewhere up in the clouds or lost in the depths of the Union basement. Proper channels would logically have to exist in order to relay feelings, reactions and generally the opinions of all students. One of the most important such channels would have to be the representatives themselves. It is they who should make themselves more accessible to the rest of the student body - they would have to go out and learn what people's general feelings are first hand. Naturally this information would have to be relayed through to the Inner Council - the gap between the executive and the mass of students would have to be bridged. It is for this reason that I am distressed when I hear that some representatives rarely attend meetings and seem more interested in organizing circuses than discussing important issues.

Participation is therefore the key and it is toward achieving this end that I will move if elected.

Mike MacMillan

Experience: ASUS Orientation Committee 1976 (Communications), Member of the Artsci '78 Executive 1974-75 and 1975-76, Faculty Board Rep 1976-77 (Film Studies), Arts Festival Committee 1975 and 1976, DSC (Film Studies), Gael.

This past year has shown us that we cannot rely solely on the AMS President and the Inner Council to provide adequate leadership for Queen's students. Instead, it is the Outer Council which has the tools and manpower to provide really effective and intelligent leadership. In this time of financial constraints and the abusive Henderson report, strong leadership is more than ever needed, and Outer Council is where it's got to come from. This is exactly where the ASUS reps should make themselves felt; they are to play a very important role in rediscovering effectiveness and sensibility in student government.

We must not allow too much power to centralize behind closed doors in a remote triumverate of AMS President and Vice-Presidents. It is the Outer Council which should be the forum for issues and problems that concern us as students

Recently, my involvement in the ASUS Orientation Committee 1976 has affected my attitudes towards student government Organizing Orientation Week has taught me that students generally do not want to confront the issue of why they are at Queen's We would rather bicker over relatively insignificant matters, than concern ourselves with encouraging a "quality education". In an attempt to confront this problem, a group of us have recently begun work on a film about Queen's, a film designed to stimulate serious thought about the purpose of our three or four years here ASUS reps to the AMS should encourage Outer Council to adress itself to issues such as those we are facing in making the film We must not and cannot waste our time wallowing in pettiness, we should, instead, set our sights on achieving a quality education in every broad sense of the word

My experience and involvement in student organizations at the Faculty level (Orientation), the year level (Artsci '78 executive), and the departmental level (DSC), as well as involvement in areas such as Info-Bank, Cineguild and CFRC Radio has given me varied insights into student concerns, an insight that will allow for honest representation of Arts and Science students' interests. I respectfully ask for your support.

During the past few years the Engineering Society has been improving the services offered by it in Clark Hall. Hopefully, by the spring, the reconstruction in Clark Hall will be complete. (At this point, input by every Engineering student is requested to ensure that the end product is what the society desires.)

With that task completed, we will be able to turn a large portion of our energies to other essential duties of the society. These duties fall under two broad headings, External Relations, and Non-Clark Hall services (which I will deal with in G.W. Wednesday). Given our strength and financial resources, we are in a position to take a larger role in organizations such as the Canadian Congress of Engineering Students. The benefits of a larger role will be great to both Queen's students and students across Canada. As Development Co-ordinator in the past year, much of my energies were spent on improving our external relations. I was a delegate to two A.P.E.O. Conferences and to the C.C.E.S. (to which I organized our first delegation in two years.) I have also initiated an Annual Regional meeting of Ontario Engineering Societies. As President I will continue to improve our external relations for the good of all Engineering students. But, I will also exercise great care to ensure that our direct student services do not suffer as a result.

For Vice-president

Paula Luck

Over the past three years, the Queen's Engineering Society has undergone a major overhaul in its operations. Since my first year, when I was a representative of Sections E and F, Clark Hall renovations have been the main focal point. In second year as Assistant Secretary of Outer Council, I became aware of the need for a better communication system in the Engineering Society. This year as Secretary of the Engineering Society I initiated monthly club reports to Outer Council and every committee that has reported to Outer Council has submitted a written report. What I would like to see is the development of consistency and communication in the Engineering Society. There is a need for a more constructive interaction between Inner and Outer Council which can only be developed by a committee structure. This requires organization on my part and participation on yours. This year I have acquired a great deal of organizational experience through the A.P.E.O. Undergraduate Conference, the Blood Drives, and the Engineering Society Social Evening. I would like you to give me the opportunity to work with you next year as Vice-President. I feel the strength of Outer Council will make this system work. In supporting me you are supporting your Engineering Society.

Kim Sturgess

The direction of the Engineering Society has changed drastically in the last three years. Some of these changes were necessary, due to new laws and constraints. However, there has been an extension in engineering interest from strictly services towards activities in other parts of the university, and beyond. This increased participation has greatly improved the position of the engineer on campus.

As Vice-President, I will continue to promote Eng Soc external affairs. At the same time, I want to ensure that the high standard of our services be maintained, if not increased. I feel that my varied background in university affairs has prepared me for this challenge. I was on the Science '77 F.R.E.C. committee, and was '77 year treasurer and Physics Club treasurer. I presently sit on Inner Council as Treasurer, and on the QUESSI Board of Directors for the Bookstore. Recently I was Queen's delegate to both the CCES conference in Newfoundland, and to the APEO conference here at Queen's. Broadening into the university sphere, I was treasurer of Queen's Project Green; I sat as Eng Soc rep on the AMS summer council, and was a member of the AMS committee to study the OFS at Queen's. With this experience in almost all areas of Eng Soc activities, I feel that I could successfully handle the responsibilities of Vice-President.

It is the concern of those presently involved in Eng Soc that, due to the large scale changes undergone, many engineering students have lost touch with the Society and its activities. Election time is when all can show their interest and support. PLEASE VOTE!

Ken Kilgour

The Senate exerts a great deal of influence on all aspects of University life, and in so doing, it's decisions have a direct impact on every student here at Queen's.

My objective is to be a part of this body.

I feel I am qualified for this position because of my previous involvement with the Engineering Faculty.

Currently I am a student member of the Faculty Board and I am on the regular staff of Golden Words. I also participated in Orientation 75 as a F.R.E.C.

If I am elected I will bring the enthusiasm, capabilities and desire necessary to be an active working representative of our Faculty.

Steve Greey

The position of Engineering Society Secretary is basically an extension of the position of Assistant Secretary. The difference being that the Secretary is responsible for the minutes of Inner Council and General Meetings, while the Assistant Secretary takes the minutes for Outer Council meetings. The Secretary is also responsible for all correspondence and files of the Society.

As I am presently Assistant Secretary of the Society and past Secretary of Science '78, I base my campaign on experience. The position of Assistant Secretary primarily allows a year of learning how the Society works. Before the Secretary can hope to keep the files and correspondence of the Society in order, he must acquaint himself with them. I feel that I already have the necessary background.

As well, I presently have two personal concerns. The first one is the completion of the Ammended Constitution's Bylaws. By Bylaw, next year's Secretary will be chairman of the Constitution Review Committee. As I am presently Secretary of this committee, I am very familiar with the new constitution and its consequences. I believe this experience will greatly aid in the successful completion of the Bylaws.

Secondly, I am interested in continuing the work that the present Secretary has done in updating the Society files.

Thus, I urge you to vote for me, or at least vote.

Charles Selby

I see the position of Secretary of the Engineering Society as an excellent opportunity both to do something for the Society and for continuing personal participation.

I feel that my involvement as Chief Frec in the past Orientation, Class Representative to the Chemical Engineering Faculty, a member of Outer Council, member of various Engineering Societie - Committees, Business Manager for Gordon House Residence, a Floor Senior, and a past D.S.C. have given me the experience necessary to do a good job.

The secretary's job is not merely to take minutes of Inner Council meetings. The secretary must act as a liaison of Ontario and the Engineering Society. I would like to see continued interesting and informative conferences with this licensing body.

If elected I will work hard to make the Blood Donor Clinics an even greater success. I also look forward to making some constructive input to the various Engineering Society Committees and will promote the Societies involvement with the Engineering Institutes of Canada. This body has a much larger scope than the A.E.P.O. and I feel that we can gain much from them.

Remember then; if you wish a job well done vote CHARLES SELBY for Secretary.

Jay Gandy

The services coordinator oversees all the operations in Clark Hall, such as the pub, Bitter Grounds and Golden Words. In the coming year, the decisions this person makes will have a major effect on Clark Hall, and the services it provides to the campus.

Currently, there are several proposals before the Engineering Society, which, if accepted, will make changes to the appearance, furniture, stage location, etc., in the lounge. I feel many of these proposals are very good ones, and should be instituted as soon as possible.

I would also like to see improvements made to the lighting system used for Bitter Grounds, and to the sound system currently used in Clark Hall. Lastly, I would like to see some good furniture and proper lights put in the small lounge in Clark (where the pool table is currently located).

My experience in the Engineering Society has been at both the year level, and the society level. This year, I'm a member of the A.M.S. Outer Council, the Engineering Society Outer Council and Science '77 Year Executive. Last year, I was a member of the freshman Orientation Committee. As well, I'm involved with Project Green, and I'm on the A.M.S committee on curriculum development.

I'd like to do the job, and I feel I'm as qualified as anyone to do it. PLEASE VOTE!

Glen Greig

I am running for Services Coordinator because I think it is the position from which I can do the most to help Engineers. Services Coordinator is the Engsoc representative for such services as Clark Hall, the pub, Golden Words, APEO connections, etc.

A large part of the job is as manager of Clark Hall. I feel that I can keep Clark Hall running smoothly and profitably, but I would like to see some changes made. Clarke Hall has two lounges - one of which (the pool room) is almost never used, and the other which is presently used only at night. If we clean up the pool room and move in the leather furniture from the pub, it can be used all the time.

I would also like to see the reduction or removal of the pub booking fee for Engineering groups. This makes it impossible for small groups such as Metallurgy or Applied Math to hold a smoker without losing money.

Other aims: Career Planning & Placement is having budget problems - it is an important service for engineers, so we should try to help them out.

Minor services (such as interyear pool tournaments, etc.) could keep us occupied some weekends. The Services Coordinator shouldn't have to run these, but he can be the whip recruiting people to organize them.

Altogether it is a demanding job, but I feel that I can offer you a lot. I ask you for your vote.

Social Development

Steve Chapman

Development Coordinator is an unique position on the executive. The D.C. has the job of developing new ideas and concepts in the society. This position is one which offers a high degree of freedom of expression, which, if used properly could benefit the society immensely. I feel I can use this position to help the Engineering Society.

I want to expand the society's contacts in external affairs. It has become increasingly apparent to me that our Engineering Society has poor ties with other societies in the country and a solid tie to the other societies would be very much to our advantage. Also our relations with the professional bodies would be strengthened.

I was President of SC. '78 in first year. This year I was the Sophomore AMS Rep. I also sat on Eng. S.OC. Outer Council and the Year Executive for the second year in a row. I am on the Board of Directors of Quesst. I am currently Vice-Chairman of the University Central Council. I feel I have the experience necessary to do the job and I would like to continue to serve your engineering Society.

Quality of Education

Many students here today were initially attracted to Queen's because of the outstanding national reputation this University has for its standards of excellence in teaching. We are now faced with insufficient financial support to maintain those standards that we value. Library hours, lab equipment and teaching staff are all being reduced in this period of restraint.

Without additional funds, this University stands to lose its distinguished position among Canadian Universities. We pledge to work closely with the University to present to the municipal, provincial and federal governments the critical need for maintaining those services which collectively determine the quality of education at Queen's.

Library Facilities

According to the Senate, our facilities have been slipping rapidly in quality: too few acquisitions, insufficient and decreasing study space, and shorter hours. Excellent library facilities are vital to the functioning of the academic community.

We will initiate an inquiry into the operation of the library facilities throughout the University. We will aid the University in assessing which library facilities the students rely upon most. This will be done for the purpose of developing priorities for the resources available to the library.

Tuition

The McKeough-Henderson Report advocated a greater than 50 percent rise in the level of tuition fees for all Provincial Universities. We are unhesitatingly opposed to any increase in the current level of fees. In addition, we feel that major revisions in the OSAP program are long overdue. Not all of OSAP's budget is used to help students because many are not eligible under the very narrow, rigid regulations.

Our efforts will be directed towards modifying the regulations of OSAP in order that all students in need can receive financial assistance.

We favour a restructuring that would allow a reduction of the age of independence, keep the loan ceiling at its current level ($800 per year) and increase total revenues within the program to allow more students to obtain low and no-interest loans. At the same time, however, we cannot support the demands for free tuition, abolition of the loan portion of financial assistance and living stipends. These are unrealistic in the short run and such demands reduce the credibility of student government.

Housing

The AMS has a responsibility not only to alleviate the short term problems but also to anticipate the problems likely to be encountered in the future. In terms of immediate problems, the Landlord-Tenant review program which has been set up by Queen's Legal Aid deserves greater financial and technical support from the AMS

Long term planning of the housing situation with constant re-evaluation is necessary. The AMS must work closely with the Senate committee on Campus Planning, the University administration, the Housing services and particularly the municipal government to combat the housing problems: shortage of units, dilapidated conditions, high rents and bad landlords

We will attempt to anticipate growth patterns around the University by establishing a special Task Force, composed of students and professional advisors to survey the situation.

Communications:

No Executive in recent years has made a concerted effort to develop strong channels of communication between the students, the Senate, and the governments under which we live.

We propose that the Vice-President (University Affairs) have as his primary responsibility the co-ordination and publication of facts and ideas. In this way the presently underutilized position will become much more important in the operations of the Executive. At the same time this new responsibility will add greatly to the efficiency and effectiveness of the AMS.

Hall Butterill and Brown can bring decisive, credible leadership to the Executive positions of the AMS. Collectively their experience provides a sound background for the AMS Executive.
Elect a team with experienced leadership.

Of basic concern is protecting the high quality of a Queen's education from being eroded by financial constraints. We must urge the University to stop cutbacks in library acquisitions and to place more emphasis on professors' teaching ability.

The Queen's Student Interest Fee, one of the highest in Canada, will approach $100.00 next year. Students should not be asked to shoulder the financial responsibilities of the University through these fees. Instead, the University should be pressed to save money by re-ordering its priorities as proposed in the AMS Financial Constraints Report.

It is time to take a stand against the landlords in this city who charge exorbitant rents, neglect maintenance, and evade rent control. They have been taking unfair advantage of the tight housing situation and it is time to fight back. An educational program to inform students of their rights is needed. Confronting these landlords through a tenants' association is a strong alternative for the students and the AMS.

The Socialist Slate

What is to be done? The experience of the '60's appears to demonstrate that a radical administration in a university is, in the end, self-defeating. It serves, through its rhetoric, to perpetuate student alienation from society at large rather than effectively integrating campus reform within a general societal transformation. However, the Socialist Slate, in contrast to the previous decade's progressive movements, is not primarily concerned with administrative alterations within the A.M.S. Rather, we are addressing ourselves to the fundamental question of the nature of the university within the present society, and hence the function of the Students' Union within the University community.

As Socialists we believe that it is impossible to view the educational system as anything but an extension of the prevailing economic structure. This does not simply mean that the university exists to reinforce the stratifications within the social order (which it does). It means that the type of university (and the type of student that is produced by it) is conditioned by the dominant ideology of society. A university in a socio-economic system wherein the worth of a person is affixed by his exchange-value (i.e. - the degree to which his talents can be converted into a marketable commodity), cannot avoid becoming a reflection of this market system. The development of creative abilities and critical skills can only be fostered in so far as they "plug into" the economic structure. The university's official line of "knowledge for the sake of knowledge" is ridiculous to the student who finds himself unemployed simply because his particular academic specialization is not "useful" to the expansion of the productive capacity of industry. The value of a student is decided independently of his own interests and abilities. In his choice of subjects the student today has the economic sword of Damocles hanging over his head. He knows that if he doesn't conform to the social perception of what occupation has "value", then, when he graduates, he will have to face a severe penalty

The quality of an education can only have meaning if there is quality in the life of the society at large when the students graduate. Education today exists only as a tool to aid in the functioning of an advanced industrial society; it cannot be an end in itself. There can be no qualitative development within this type of university: there can only be quantitative edification i.e - the production of people skilled in manipulation of data. The critical tradition of the university (i.e.-qualitative development which enables the person to distinguish between what is and what should be) is incompatible with the present society simply because it doesn't have market value: the search for meaning does not necessarily require the building of a bridge. At present knowledge formational units, and the content and organization of these units is conditioned by the class nature of the society in which the university operates.

The Socialist Slate believes that students are both victims of and participants in, an oppressive economic system. They are being trained to become the future managers and technocrats of an industrial structure. It is ridiculous to view the Henderson report on fiscal restraint as an attack on students. The report is not an aberration, a temporary adjustment to an unfavourable economic climate. It is a profoundly rational document if one believes in the present system. If the university serves to provide corporate managers, and if there is a contraction in the market's ability to absorb large numbers of new people in this area, then the system will invest its money in the university in a more efficient way i.e.-one which produces fewer (but more "dependable") students. When and if the economy grows at a higher rate, then the government's investment will expand proportionately. Thus, the question is not whether or not the government wants you to go to university; it is the kind of university it wants you to go to.

Students are commodities in an economic system. It is this fact that puts them in the same position as the working people of society: both segments are in a subordinate position in the determination of market-value. One of the Socialist Slate's basic aims is to aid in the transformation of the self-perceptions of the students. The university atmosphere perpetuates the isolation of the students from the other elements of the social order. The student's realization that his skills are not valuefree, and, in fact, can only be used to reinforce the prevailing economic structure, is often delayed until after graduation (if then). Playing around with statistics in a classroom is obviously quite different from actually being a statistic yourself. If your number is inscribed in the unemployment column or on the table which reads "low income earners", all that self-righteous talk about the indolence of Canadian workers fades into irrelevance.

It is for this reason the Socialist Slate believes that students must unite with workers both on and off campus to effect radical change not only with regard to university financing, but also with respect to the economic order in general. There is no such thing as "student politics": every level of government is interlocked in some way with the power structure of the society as a whole. There are no "student issues": the questions to be addressed in a university election are inextricably linked to the functioning of the industrial system. The issue is not whether Queen's has a good pub. The concern of students should be directed towards the nature of the university, its place within the economic system, and the ramifications of this for those at the lower end of the income scale.

Only by advancing the interests of students in concert with the activities of the other disadvantaged segments of the population, can there result a social transformation which will encompass the liberation of all people and allow them to be valued as human beings and not just as functional units on an assembly line. It is to this end that the Socialist Slate is dedicated, and it is through the employment of the A.M.S. as a primarily political body that we hope to further its realization.

The above is the context in which the purpose and functions of the AMS must be viewed The following are some of the specific policies which the AMS should follow in order to fulfull its functions as a political body which is integrated into, and not isolated, from society. Clearly, the effectiveness of our policies will be dependent on the level of support you, as students, give our policies.

Students must unite with other groups to oppose attempts by government to place the burden of a failing economy on working people through wage controls and social service butbacks. Within the university, educational cutbacks must not be unfairly born by unprotected staff. We advocate:

-More community accesability and input into Queen's facilities and resources.

-Strong and positive support for OFS, to strengthen and broaden its functions.

-Joining NUS to promote a strong, national student organization.

-unionization of grad students, and teaching assistents.

-Student aid programs which ensure real accessability to a university education.

We believe that the AMS should support any programs which decrease dependency on a profit system, develop a cooperative consciousness, or promote alternative economic insitiutions We propose:

-the use of the approx. $30,000 in the capital fund of AMS. inc. for the develpment of food and housing co-ops.

-AMS support for Kingston tenant mobilization.

-supporting boycotts aimed at helping exploited peoples.

-a resource centre which would promote the above activities.

We believe that the AMS should be a force which apposes exploitation and discrimination against any group in our society. We advocate:

-furthering AMS support for the Women's Office and Gay movements.

-that all the recommendations of the Committee on the Status of Women at Queen's be implemented immediately.

-contact and support for prisoners in Kingston institutions, specifically support for Prisoner's Unions.

-an end to sexist discrimination in athletic programs.

We believe that the critical function of Queen's university is minimal, due to an unchallenged ideology that student's absorb both in what they learn, and in how they learn We are committed to:

- the development of a critical academic perspective at Queen's.
- changes in the Queen's orientation week
- the establishment of constructive, problem oriented inter-disciplinary studies, such as women's studies, and native peoples studies.
- establishing organizations such as OPIRG on campus.
- student involvement in decisions concerning course and degree requirements.
- effective evaluation of both course and professor, including strong student voice on tenure and appointment decisions.

The AMS should organize and support any attempts that allow students to participate with faculty and administration as equals in determining the structure and quality of their education. This might best be realized through genuine course unions which would replace the politically impotent DSC's.

The socialist slate believes that these programs should form the basis for a politically active AMS. This political function of student government should also act in conjunction with the co-ordination and provision of student services such as the Pub and the typing service. But services should not be the AMS's major priority. We have provided an identifiable platform for the AMS election. We ask you to consider our alternative.

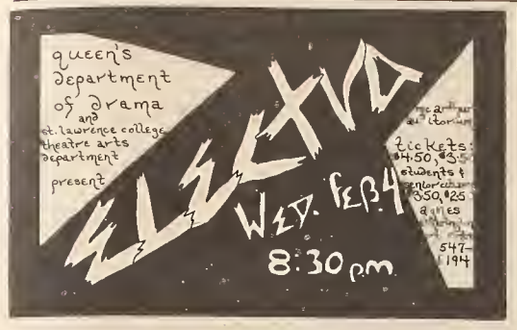
HOUSING LOTTERY

Wednesday FEB. 4

GRANT HALL



Doors open 6-7

Draw at 7:15

Rules and procedure

1. The lottery establishes only a position on the waiting list. The number of units available of any size depends on the number of renewals. There is usually a 50 percent turnover. We will know which apartments and houses will be available on March 1, at which time you will be informed if you have a unit.
2. The lottery is open only to Queen's students who will be registered as full time students for the academic year 1976-1977. Pink cards must be presented at the lottery or at the AMS office by 5 pm Fri. Feb. 6 if a place on the list is obtained. You don't have to stay for the draw, but it is up to you to find out if your name is selected. A list of those names will be posted on the bulletin board outside the AMS office.
3. Each student is entitled to only one ballot, available at the door, which can be applied to only one type of dwelling unit. If two ballots are found in the same name both will be destroyed. However, if you are applying for a five-man house, for example, all five prospective tenants may apply. Bring your own pencil to sign ballot.
4. An individual whose name is drawn and who chooses to accept the dwelling must be a tenant of the unit, and must have his name on the lease (and be legally bound by the terms of the lease.)
5. Units leased through AMS Housing based on number of single bedrooms.

Kierans views corporations cynically

Nancy Bowes

Eric Kierans warned his audience on Friday evening that he looks "at corporations with a cynical eye."

Kierans addressed the Dunning Auditorium audience on the Canadian economy as the third visitor to Queen's in the 1976 Chancellor Dunning Trust Lecture Series.

The Canadian economist was not long in getting the core of the problem he wished to address: "We haven't found any way of coming to grips with the corporation – politically, socially or financially."

Kierans spoke of the relationship of the state to the corporation; they are not divorced from each other. He made it clear that the corporation must be directly and completely subservient to the state.

Kierans wished to impress upon the assembled people the benefit involved in the creation of a limited liability. An investor in a corporation cannot lost more than he has invested in the venture, whereas a proprietor or partner may lose all his worldly possessions if the business fails.

He added, however, that "we have created a legal institution which we do not yet understand. The most successful corporation is the one that most ruthlessly denies the needs of the present," in favour of investing profits in other corporations.

Kierans expressed concern that the corporation is a legal person which, unlike a human being, is immortal. The corporation, according to Kierans, is not a means to an end, but rather an end in itself. In creating corporations with no responsibility to society, "we did something which we have not yet been able to undo."

Kierans had facts at his fingertips regarding the actual degree of corporate power in Canada. Of 231,000 corporations, 291 corporations control 58 percent of the total assets. Of 21,998 Canadian manufacturing firms, 83 hold 46 percent of the total assets. Speaking of the Canadian economic situation Kierans remarked that "it's a definition of concentrated oligopoly."

The lecturer was careful to point out that the problem lies not in the people, but in the corporations themselves. The people come and go but the corporations remain "as a vehicle for perpetual accumulation and growth," commented Kierans.

He expressed regret that corporations had been created without any reference to any body larger than themselves, rather than as a means of attaining the priorities as established by the government.

During the question period, Kierans advised each member of the audience to develop and exploit the unique qualities we all possess. It is part of the nature of the true market that each person become a monopolist, that each person discover the edge that he has and play that edge for all it is worth.

Kierans recommended that the corporations be made responsible to its shareholders. This could be effected by distributing all of the corporation's profit to its shareholders (in cash and shares) and then by taxing the shareholders on their dividends.

Proof of Professor Kierans' deep effect on his audience was shown by the last question which was a request for Kierans to make a submission to the Bryce Commission studying corporations. Kierans managed to elicit a laugh of resignation with his cynical answer: "I haven't got very many hopes for the Bryce Commission. I know right now what they're going to come out with: 'We need more information'."

- bottomley

Eric Kierans offered his opinions on the Canadian economy to the Journal on Friday afternoon and to the public on Friday evening.

Priorities are all crossed up

Nancy Bowes

"We've got our priorities all crossed up," asserted Eric Kierans in an interview with the Journal on Friday afternoon,

Kierans was replying to a question regarding his book published in 1967, Challenge of Confidence: Kierans on Canada. In the first chapter of that book, the author wrote that Canada is young and "rich in the freedom to choose the principal directions of our future." The Journal asked Kierans if Canada still has plenty of time.

The McGill economics professor and one-time member of the Lesage and Trudeau cabinets replied in the affirmative. We must "make up our mind what our objectives are." Referring to the matter of policy on natural resources, Kierans insisted that it is "a matter of riding out" what is already in our power

When asked about Prime Minister Trudeau's statement about the future of the free enterprise system, Kierans commented that he "didn't see too much to be upset about." Kierans maintains a strong belief in the viability of the free enterprise system. He insisted that all governments, except totalitarian regimes, make as much use as possible of the market. Kierans implied that Trudeau would not do away with the present system.

The eminent economist went on to explain that the free enterprise system breaks down because of a concentration of economic power. Kierans called corporate control "a centre of power we can't tolerate."

Kierans had constructive criticism for Trudeau's wage and price controls. He suggested that the government lower tariffs, thereby introducing outside competition for corporations. Kierans cited the fantastic wage settlements made as proof that the corporations could afford some foreign competition He wants Trudeau to make the free enterprise system work by letting business go ahead – not by bribing it to do so.

When the Journal asked Mr. Kierans' opinion of Prime Minister Trudeau's style of leadership, he refused to comment, saying that he was no longer in politics.

Kierans shed some much-needed light on the complex topic of the Canadian economy and, more importantly, offered constructive suggestions for the rectification of our problems.

submitted by Rob Beamish

Eric Kierans attempted to reinstate in his audience a renewed trust in the liberal democratic ideals of John Locke, and faith in Adam Smith's guiding hand of the free market after condemning multinational corporations. In this of commentary concerning Kierans' address, I will show why the recommendations for action proposed by Kierans were at best naive, and at worst palpably false.

Professor Kierans began the essence of his lecture by stating that the government and the corporate spheres of society are not two bodies whose interest parallel each other. Rather, the government, representing the needs and well-being of the people, has a fundamental concern regarding the corporate sector. The government is responsible for checking corporate power in the interests of the people. In effect, the argument presented was very similar to the role of government proferred by by the Lockean view of liberal democratic society.

Professor Kierans followed those statements with an historical discussion of the development of the legal "structures" that lead to the formation of the corporation. Within that context, Kierans presented the most interesting and informative portion of his address. He began with the birth of the corporation and traced its growth and development to the stages of corporate oligopoly, the multinationals, and the concentration of monopoly capitalism. The portrait drawn was one that too many of us are so very familiar with today. Indeed, it was this portion of Friday's lecture that represented the strongest point of the entire address. The ensuing solutions that Professor Kierans suggested to remedy the situation, however, were based on premises that must be challenged.

There are two criticisms that can be made of the Kieransean solution: the first must be directed to his faith in Adam Smith, and the natural guiding hand of the market economy, and the second to his analysis of the activity of government in capitalist society. Although both of these have intriguing potential for discussion, it is to the latter that I will confine a few brief comments.

It is a fact of a capitalist society that because a portion of the society controls the modes of production that they control the power of that society. Control of the power within a society is concomitant with control of the government in that society. Thus, although a government may be presented to the people as representative of a universal interest, it is always conditioned by the desires and needs of the ruling class.

For Kierans to advocate as a solution, to our current economic situation, the simple removal of the legislative structures that allow for the legal existence of the corporation is naive. First, those structures developed because the open competitive market was something that the bourgeois found they did not want (cf Robert Heilbroner, The Limits of American Capitalism for a very straightforward development of this point). Second, in the event (as impossible as its likelihood is) that the structures were removed by government, on what basis does Kierans believe that government would suddenly begin to represent the needs of the people? The power and modes of production would still be in the hands of only a portion of society and, as history has taught us, elite ruling groups pursue their interests first and foremost. As Marx wrote, state and civil society will never be rejoined until private property has been positively transcended

It is obvious on the theoretical level, and in the practical experiences of a nation, that the government and corporate sectors do not exist in parallel; they are very much entwined. But the significant fact is that it is not the people's interests that government represents (or will ever represent) in capitalist society; it is the interests of capitalists (corporate oligopoly or not). This seminally important point was completely obfuscated in Friday's lecture.

Finally, some may say that the ideals of a collectivist state represent tremendous difficulties concerning implementation. Perhaps Edward Andrew (cf Political Theory, (1975) vol. 3, p.305-16) is most accurate in his investigation of the notion of political praxis. Andrew wrote that both Marx and Nietzsche looked closely at the society about them, thought carefully, and decided that what was needed was an in situ experiment. Neither could foresee how successful that experiment would be, but given the existent reality, its future prospects (which Kierans has so graphically added to), and the limited potential for qualitative change within the current system, a call for action was necessary. Professor Kierans was correct, as were Marx and Nietzsche, that change is needed. But the Kieransean solution to return to classic liberal capitalism is not the one that should be advocated at the present time.

Little debate on Tenure report

Bob Reynolds

The report of the OFS Advisory Committee on Tenure was accepted Thursday night by Outer Council after receiving little discussion. As the Report stated, and Peter Lane reiterated, the function of the brief is "to raise questions rather than provide answers." Lane chastised Outer Council members for not giving it the attention that it deserved.

One of the major considerations of the Report is the question of tenure with respect to the present financial constraints. The Report notes that "dismissals can only be made for reasons of negligence or misconduct", therefore, "the university administration finds itself in the somewhat uncomfortable position of having to consider dismissals because of financial considerations."

One response of faculty members to these financial constraints has been to form strong associations or unions. The Report mentions the Carleton University Academic Staff Association in particular as it became certified as a bargaining unit last spring. The Report does not favour the unionization of staff because it is feared that senior, rather than meritorious, staff members would be favoured in the case of a layoff.

The Report also deals with the never-ending dilemma of "publish or perish." The traditional argument has been that for a professor to stay on top of his field he must be actively involved in research As the Report states, however, "Any evaluation of research activity must recognize quality as well as quantity." What the Report does recommend, one of the few recommendations, is that, "The University must make a significant effort towards evaluating and rewarding teaching efforts as well as research efforts."

Despite the fact that this Report deals with an important variable in the quality of education, instruction, and that one of the purposes of the Report was to obtain feedback, most members of Outer Council did not choose to speak on the issue. Brian Copeland did, however, point out that in light of a changing education system and financial constraint that, "tenure is no longer viable."

Rees Cosgrove reiterated the report's concern over unionization of faculty. Cosgrove pointed out that universities do not fall into this pattern of union-management relations.

Discussion on the Report lasted five minutes.

UTC folds; Lane: McVie: 2, AMS: 0

Giles Gherson

The University Travel Club has been formally disbanded after a life span of a little over two months. A motion to this effect was passed by Outer Council last Thursday night. In accounting for the collapse of UTC to Outer Council members, Bernie Koch, Director of Queen's Student Agencies, expanded on comments made to the Journal last week.

He said that the club had folded following a meeting between himself and Murray O'Shea, President of UTC, on January 22 at which it was concluded that it was "unfeasible to continue service." This decision resulted from a series of events which began during the Christmas holidays, when Reid Leasing Agencies of Toronto, through which UTC rented its buses, collapsed. Although another firm, Cane Corporation, subsequently offered its services to UTC, Koch rejected their terms, referring to them as "inadequate."

In the first place its rates were significantly less attractive than those of Reid Leasing Agencies, being not only higher, but also on a per bus basis, rather than a per seat charge. Secondly, Cane Corporation had supplied the buses for last year's transportation debacle - the Excursion Club - and Koch implied that their services then had been somewhat less than satisfactory. Therefore, given a period of low demand at this point, it was "felt unprofitable" for UTC to continue to operate.

Koch stated that he was satisfied with the Club's books, which he had audited. He also asserted that, on the basis of the number of tickets bought (34 to Montreal, 649 to Toronto and 49 to Ottawa), students at Queen's had found it a "useful" service.

On being questioned by Peter Lane, External Affairs Commissioner, as to what had become of all the money earned by UTC - $744 from membership fees as well as 50 cents on each ticket sold - such that there remained a mere $35, Koch revealed that UTC had been "running into a loss." He claimed that the $744 had been used to "cover fixed costs incurred during the operation" of the club and that there had been other miscellaneous expenses such as payment of ticket sellers.

Lane also called for "a substantial examination of Don McVie and their leasing." Citing Don McVie's close involvement with last year's Excursion Club as well as his connection with Reid Leasing Agencies, Lane claimed that his present standing with regard to AMS was Don McVie - 2, AMS - 0.

Koch replied that he had investigated Reid Leasing judiciously at the outset and was "100 percent sure" of its competence. He pointed out that McVie had been based in Mississauga and that he had been involved with several ventures, of which one was UTC. There was no contractual arrangement between UTC and McVie; his firm supplied the buses as UTC asked for them. Thus, AMS had no method of controlling McVie and "we have to suffer...if McVie goes under," which he did.

Ian Nordheimer, AMS President, reminded Outer Council that they, rather than Koch, had agreed to the arrangements in the full knowledge that McVie was involved and that therefore the responsibility was theirs. He applauded Koch "for acting quickly and getting out of the affair" when the new arrangements appeared unsatisfactory.

Lane subsequently announced that the AMS is presently negotiating with Voyageur Colonial Ltd. for a cheap travel service. Lane claimed that this would be "the best way to provide cheap transportation for Queen's students."

As final preparations for the AMS elections draw to a close, the Journal questioned Queen's students who they thought would most likely win.

"I'm not really sure as of yet," replied Martha Etherington (Engineering '79). "I haven't been able to decide between Avis or Hall, since their platforms seem quite similar." Though generally advocating the principles behind the Socialist platform, Martha believed that Queen's was not yet ready for such a change. "I don't think the Socialist Slate will win since a lot of people think they are putting on a farce." Martha felt the Socialists were too large a group, which could likely lead to the disorganization and cluttering of student government. "I don't know that much about the AMS," was Martha's honest reply, "since it is only my first year at Queen's." Martha, however, plans to vote.

When Joe Latour (Commerce '78) was confronted, he quickly replied, "The Commerce guys of course: Cindi Hall, Brown and Butterill." To defend an accusation that this reply could quite possibly be biased since he was in Commerce, Joe added, "the major reason why I choose the Hall team is because they have more experience in handling financial affairs."

Joe, however, later admitted that either the Avis or Hall team were equally experienced and capable of doing a sufficient job. "The only ones who don't seem to be saying much of anything, are the Socialists. I don't really know what their platform is, or what they plan to do to help this University as a whole." Joe closed with a pessimistic tone, when stating, "I don't expect that many will be out to vote since no one knows who will really do the best job."

"There is going to be a split vote, and the Socialists will come up in the end," was Steve Fast's (Engineering '78) prediction. Steve felt he roughly knew the various platforms, yet failed to see any differences that really mattered. "I don't wish the Socialists to win since it would cause a lot of havoc." Steve pointed out that the Socialist Slate did not appear to have the business experience needed to run the AMS as the students want it to be run. "However," Steve added, "the Socialist Slate has certainly shown a lot of social conscience, something that hasn't really been expressed by the other platforms." Steve concluded, "We are certainly a part of, if not parasites of, society; therefore, we should show more consideration."

Pete Lamprey (Politics '77) replied, "First of all, I would completely discount the Socialist Slate, no matter how qualified they may be." Pete justified this by noting that Queen's is far too conservative to give anyone with an admittedly socialist platform any chance. With regards to the other two contending teams, Pete admitted he was having trouble making a choice. "It's almost a flip of the coin," Pete remarked, "but I would say Avis will probably win mainly because of his inclusion of Paul Steep and his involvement within the AMS." The Hall team, Pete felt, was also quite qualified; therefore an equally good argument on their behalf could be made. Of the opinion that the group who shows more concern for student services would be given top priority, Pete was unsure of who that group should be.

Touch healing study discussed

Barb Nyland

Healing, achieved by the touch of a so-called healer, has for centuries been attributed solely to the power of suggestion. Dr. B.R. Grad of the Department of Psychiatry at McGill University decided to test the assumption that this healing had no basis in objective physical reality. From his laboratory work, which started about two decades ago, he has found strong proof that more than suggestion is involved.

Dr. Grad, who obtained his Ph.D. in endocrinology, described some of the experiments he has performed in a lecture held last Friday in Earl Hall. His visit was sponsored by KARP, the Kingston Association for Research in the Parasciences.

Grad has studied the effect of what he calls "the laying-on-of-the-hands treatment" on artifically produced goiters in laboratory mice. He worked with three groups of mice. One group was held twice a day for five days a week by a man who was found to have possible healing powers. A second group was treated with heat to simulate the effect of the hands and the last group was not treated at all and thus acted as a control. From his data Grad found that there was a significant difference between the rate at which the goiter was reduced in the touch-treatment mice and the heat-treated mice.

Grad also experimented with wound healing on mice. Again the mice treated by the healer progressed more quickly than those which were not treated.

While studying the effects of a laying-on-of-the-hands on plants Grad discovered that the healer did not have to touch the plants directly. He merely held the water with which they were fed. The treated plants grew taller and bushier, stated Grad.

Grad has no explanation for these phenomena but said "we must start going back to the energies talked about centuries ago. Further study is very necessary in this area."

Grad was also very careful to caution his audience that the laying-on-of-the-hands is not a miraculous cure-all. "We cannot assume that these people can heal everything," he said.

CUNSA conference

The "Images of the Bachelor of Nursing Science Nurse" will be the theme of the 1976 Convention of the Canadian University Nursing Students Association (CUNSA).

The three-day conference takes place this weekend at Queen's with 350 people registered to attend from across Canada. CUNSA exists as a method of exchanging information between schools on summer job and post-graduate opportunities.

Two of the sessions are open to the public at $3.00 per session. They will be held in Grant Hall.

On Friday between 1 and 4 pm, seven guest speakers will talk about new roles in nursing. On Saturday between 9 and 12 am, the conference will host a Nurse Practitioner Symposium.

Further information is available from the co-ordinator of the conference, Doreas Kennedy.

Another attempt to restructure AMS

Giles Gherson

A task force has been formed "to present a brief on the question of Executive Restructuring to a Special Meeting of Council on or before April 1, 1976." This represents a second attempt this year by AMS to re-evaluate the present structure of the AMS Executive.

Two weeks ago, the AMS Restructuring Committee submitted a two and one-half page report to Outer Council, which recommended that "the existing constitutional structure governing the positions of the executive remain in its present structure." Outer Council rejected the report. At the time, Bob Atkinson, President of ASUS, referred to it as "incomplete"; subsequently, Ian Nordheimer, AMS President, explained Outer Council's dissatisfaction in terms of the report's brevity and lack of conspicuous reasoning.

The motion creating the new task force also called for the disbanding of the AMS Restructuring Committee. According to Doug Bonnell, AMS McArthur representative, more general terms of reference are to offer "definite alternatives" to the present structure. Its report will be brought to Outer Counci for debate, the goal being to at last find the solution to a problem which has been nagging at the AMS since the "John Gray Affair" last fall.

At last Thursday's Outer Council meeting, both Jamie Avis, Education Commissioner, and Ian Nordheimer expressed strong reservations as to the usefulness of the task force at this time. However, Outer Council endorsed Doug Bonnell's position that "this is an issue of relative importance to be solved once and for all."

International week time for insight and understanding submitted by Mohamed M. Keshavjee

It was in keeping with Canada's international image that Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau spoke in fluent Spanish in Mexico while on his Latin American tour.

Canadian students today are exposed to greater international influences than ever before due to the multifaceted programmes of CUSO, CIDA and other bilateral agreements between Canada and countries of the Third World, Europe and Australia. One does not have to see far beyond the confines of Queen's University to notice how very cosmopolitan our own university has become. We can see the films of SATYAJIT RAY, enjoy an evening of classical Chinese dancing, eat Italian food and participate in West Indian limbo dances. We see students in resplendent national costumes at our functions. Needless to say an understanding of foreign cultures can be gained right here at the University. With the leading role Canada is playing in world affairs, it is imperative that Canadian university students get an insight into the cultures, dances, costumes and cuisines of different countries.

Queen's University in cooperation with the Rotary Clubs of Kingston and the area, have made it possible for students of various countries to meet each other, as well as Canadian students, in an atmosphere of conviviality. To quote Dr. J.A. Corry, a former principal of the University, through whose farsightedness and endeavours, the International Centre was established:

"It is fulfilling in practice the high hopes we had for it as a place where Canadians, students and non-students, meet students who have come here from all parts of the world and participate with them in a wide range of activities."

The main idea behind the International Centre, the International Club and the various ethnic clubs, eg. the Chinese Club, Indian Club, West Indian Club, Islamic Society, Ukrainian Club, Filipino Association, and the Africa Association; is the promotion of international understanding. Daily, nations of the world are aspiring to this goal, through the exchange of ambassadors, bilateral agreements and other reciprocal arrangements. We at the university level have the added advantage of relating to each other in an atmosphere of unimpeachable relaxation, free from any suspicion. It is precisely in such an atmosphere that the understanding that nations spend years to attain, is attainable.

The International Centre also provides services and information of varying types. There is a CUSO office which deals with the applicants interested in working abroad, and Kaspar Pold, the Overseas Student Advisor, is available at any time for consultation with individual overseas students, the university and the community at large.

The International Club under the able leadership of Michael Jay, an internationalist himself (whose father is now Canada's ambassador to Stockholm), who has lived in various countries of the world, is organizing an International Week commencing Thursday, February 5th, 1976 with "Wildlife Conservation in Kenya": A 45 min. film followed by a question and answer period with Tony Lopez - Kenya Tourist Representative in Canada. Considering that there are over 1,000 foreign students attending Queen's in this academic year, the staging of International Week is of no small significance.

The following is a list of the other events planned:

Friday, Feb. 6 - International Film Festival 3pm-6pm, Lower Lounge, International Centre.

Saturday, February 7th at 8pm: A semi-formal "UNIVERSALIS" at the West Campus Cafeteria. One of Toronto's top discos will be in attendance–"The Penny Farthing".

Sunday, February 8th, 2:00-5:30 pm: A table tennis tournament, BEWS gym.

Monday, February 9th, 10 am-8 pm: African Art exhibit at the International Centre.

Tuesday, February 10th, 7:30 pm: International Food Night at the International Centre, Lower Lounge.

Throughout the International Week, "Go International" buttons will be sold. All money will go to sponsoring a foster child for one year.

No doubt the International Centre will be a mini United Nations for the week and I would recommend every student to participate.

Bus-it issue continues, Nordheimer fed up

Giles Gherson

"I've just about had the biscuit", claimed Ian Nordheimer, AMS President, to Outer Council last Thursday night. Such, apperently, was the extent of his frustration in trying to work out an agreement with the university on the Bus-it issue

In a report submitted to Outer Council, Nordheimer gave a chronological description of the events that have occured so far in the Busit Story 1976-77. Briefly this entails a series of meetings held between Nordheimer and Paul steep (Vice-president Operations) on the one hand, and variously with the University Principal Dr. Ronald Wats, and the Public Utilities Commission (PUC). Following a decision by the AMS to renegotiate the Bus-it contract. Nordheimer and Steep learned at a PUC meeting that given a 25 percent increase in adult bus fare, the cost for Bus-it would be $83,500 or $8.35 per student. This year students were charged $6.95 each for the service. This cost per student reflects a 60 percent of the total cost for Bus-it; the university pays the other 40 percent. The AMS were concerned that the university maintain its present rate of input, however, on January 26 Watts notified the AMS of his insistence "that university support for 1976-77 and any subsequent year be set on a dollar figure per student, rather than a percentage..." While he did commit the university to paying it's 40 percent next year - $3.55 per student - he indicated that even this level would have to be reviewed for future years.

Watt's refusal to agree to any long term arrangement concerned Nordheimer as well as several other Outer Council members who feel that students should not be asked to pay more for such a vital service

As a reflection of this point of view, Peter Lan, External Affairs Commissioner, proposed an amendment to the motion which placed the following question on the February Referenda "Shall the student interest fee for Bus-It be increased from $4.50 to $5.35 to fund the 1976-77 Bus-It program?" The amendment which was passed stipulated that students should pay on an equal basis with the university

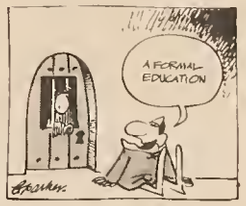
Lane also wondered how the university considered that it was "getting a bad deal out of Bus-It." He claimed that Bus-It was in the interest of the university on the grounds that a corridor between the two campuses is essential, and also that the service helped spread housing, which is needed.

Bruce Trotter, the Rector, also felt that the university "has a responsibility to provide at least some kind of shuttle service" between the campuses and that they should therefore be asked to pay for a shuttle service, following the example of University of Toronto.

Where has all the money gone?

In his President's Report at Thursday night's Outer Council meeting, Ian Nordheimer commented on the AMS Theatre Fund, an issue that had been raised in the Queen's Journal on January 23. It was disclosed, at that time, that $32,000 raised by Queen's students for a new theatre and held in trust by the AMS, was transferred by the University Administraton from a Theatre Trust Fund Account into a University Centre Account. This action, stated a later editorial, violated the AMS constitution.

Nordheimer stated that he had met with Ken Brodie from the University Administration and hoped that they were "getting a little closer to the solution." He stated that he did not think there "was any question that the money was transferred legally," adding however, that the money "May not have been transferred morally."



New board

The AMS Outer Council approved the following individuals to Elrond Board of Directors for the 1976-77 academic year; Bill Young, Alan Richardson, Bob Michaud.

Leger award

As the first event in RMC's centennial the Right Honourable Jules Leger, C.C., C.M.M., C.D., Governor-General of Canada, will receive an honourary doctor of laws (L.L.D.) from the College Chancellor, Defence Minister James Richardson. The ceremony will take place on February 7 at 11 am during a special convocation.

At the same time the Governor-General will unveil a plaque at the new Girouard Building, named after Colonel Sir Percy C. Girouard, an 1885 RMC graduate.

$150 grant

The AMS decided Thursday night to grant $150 to the Kingston Community Science Fair. In speaking to his motion, Peter Lane, Commissioner for External Affairs, pointed out that the fair "is a chance to give people a creative forum". Lane also described the fair as "consistent of everything university stands for", therefore implying that Queen's has an obligation to support it.

Give the gift of life today

pauta luck

If you haven't realized it yet there is a Blood Donor Clinic in Lower Victoria Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week. I would urge everyone to take the time to give the gift of life and participate in the Corpuscle Cup competition. The Engineering Society is featuring a competition between every year of every faculty here at Queen's. It includes everyone and will be awared on the basis of maximum percentage participation. For those of you who have never given blood before, the hardest part of giving blood is thinking about giving it. I think that you will have to agree that the importance of a gift of life should outweigh these initial inhibitions that each of us have. The actual donation takes only 5 minutes and you will receive first class treatment from the experienced nurses who run the clinic and those who volunteer to assist them. Free coffee and donuts will be served at the clinic. The hours of the clinic are from 11.00-2.00 and 5.00-8.00 on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week. So gather your courage together and come over to the clinic in Victoria Hall. Show that you care. It is going to be a close race for the Corpuscle Cup. Every pint counts!

No time No vote

Dear Editors,
This is to register our discontent with the decision of Outer Council to put forward yet another set of referenda during the presidential election tomorrow and Thursday.

We expect that many students will not have had adequate time to even read the questions by then, let alone give them serious consideration. There will obviously be no time for any sort of debate in the Journal with regard to these proposals because the next edition will contain the results of these ballots rather than the words of discussion which would be more appropriate.

It is our hope that the students will register their discontent to Outer Council by not voting on these short noticed questions.

Book-hogs and fair play

Dear Editors,
The letters (January 20 and 27) from Glen Farley and Ian Cameron express a genuine problem. They have every sympathy from the library staff. The book-hog sometimes appears, and when (s)he does, (s)he may often frustrate one or a dozen others--usually because an essay topic has been assigned to a number of people.

You may be interested in the crazy phenomenon of the way books are borrowed. In calendar 1975, 90,267 separate volumes out of about 450,000 were borrowed through the computer terminals in Douglas Library. Of these, nearly half (42,706) were used only once. A fifth (19,173) were used twice. Less than an eighth (10,820) were used three times each. Only 4395 volumes were used more than six times each during the year. One would think from this, that nearly all the books should be available when you want them. Unfortunately 'taint' so. When a book is wanted by one person for reasons connected with a course, there's a very good chance at least one other person in the same course will want it at the same time.

The library regularly gets from the computer system a printout showing books which are in frequent demand. From this, additional copies are ordered. This however can only be after the fact--the computer cannot predict demand, only record what happened.

When library staff detect that demand is becoming heavy for certain items, they may be placed on reserve. This too is after the fact--after the lucky first comer has the item--so the book must be recalled for reserve.

Prediction is the difficult problem. The winds of use blow so chancily through the stacks that Ian Cameron's solution--limiting the number of books to any one person--might not be fair to many borrowers. Cameron correctly says "two books might be too much of a restriction in some cases, and not restrictive enough to others".

At some future time, an on-line computer circulation system might permit control of the number of books taken by any one borrower. At present, with the service load we must handle, this can't be done. But this is not the ideal control method.

Fair play must be the real method. Prompt return of books, borrowing only those which are actually needed for an extended time; and consideration of the other guy who has the same essay topic, are platitudes which will bounce off the offender.

Some remedy is with the frustrated user. Ask Information Service staff for suggestions about finding additional material. Ask Circulation Desk staff to recall material--tell them the reason if it has been assigned for class use, or for mass essay writing. Explore the card catalogue and the stacks for other material. Ask the Monograph Orders unit if there's any possibility of getting more copies.

But please, take it out on the guy who hogs the books, not on the library. It would not be fair to the four thousand users a day in Douglas Library to tighten the borrowing regulations unduly, just to control one or two book hogs.

David Wang, Head of Central Collection Services, will always be glad to hear reasonable, detailed and specific complaints when users can't get what they need, and what the library should be able to supply.

Photos disappoint

Dear Editors:
I would like to write in agreement with the letter in the Journal of two weeks ago, with respect to the 'official' Tricolor graduate photographers, Cameron and Sparks. I too was very disappointed in the work they did, the service I got, and the way I was treated by them when I was there. All this for $15.00, a sitting for which the proofs must be returned.

I then went to Wallace Berry, the old Tricolor graduate photographer for a sitting, and the difference was phenomenal! He was a very nice, friendly man, who knew how to work with people and thoroughly enjoyed doing it! He was much more professional during the actual sitting, and, in contrast to the other photographers, he actually seemed to know what he was doing, and took pride in how he was doing it. Not only were the pictures incomparably better, but it was only $10.00 a sitting, for which the proofs can be kept. In other words, it seems to me, a better deal all around.

So, what I want to know is, why did the Tricolor change photographers, and is there anything we can do to influence this decision, so future graduates are given a better deal?

Bonnell draws fire-again

Dear Editors,
Brian Copeland's Churchmouse of Jan. 30 voiced the concern that "the most difficult assignment for a journalist is to report a story without bias." Doug Bonnell's pontificating article on that same page illustrates the glaring truth of this observation. I was greatly disturbed by the content and tone of Bonnell's simplistic attack on the candidacy of Brina Mulroney for the leadership of the Progress Conservative Party.

I believe the explanation for this lapse of objectivity on Bonnell's part is itself rather simple; he is deeply involved in the campaign of Flora MacDonald, another participant in the Tory leadership race. It is interesting to note that Bonnell neglected to mention this fact while flailing away with awkward strokes at the efforts of the candidate who is increasingly viewed as the best person to succeed Robert Stanfield.

I am supporting Mulroney for reasons quite apart from those which Bonnell irresponsibly implies are the secrets of the former's success. It is often said that the mud in any political contest ends up being hurled at the front runner by slipping competitors. Bonnell's behaviour seems merely to conform to this phenomenon. For Mulroney is the only candidate for whom delegate support - and yes Bonnell, it is coming from that "grass roots populistic" level to which you refer - is increasing, a result of the only truly national campaign being conducted.

The regrettable part of all this is not so much that Bonnell has deceived his readers in choosing not to reveal his own subjective interest in this matter, but that a writer who should know better and who preaches of morality has compromised his integrity as a journalist.

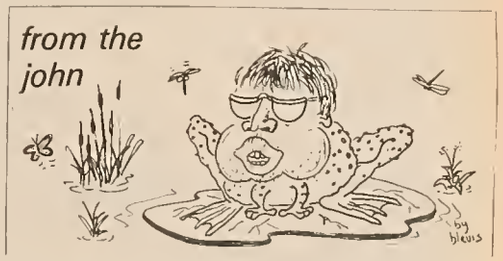
Theatre fund controversy



Dear Editors:
In the Journal editorial of Jan. 27, 1976, you suggest in rather strong terms that the current Vice-President (Operations) should be doing everything in his power "more and more" to ensure the return of the Theatre Building Fund to the students of Queen's. As in most cases the solution to this problem is not as simple as your editorial would seem to imply. The transfer of the funds may well have been done without due regard for the proper procedures. The fact remains that no one really knows how the transfer was made and we are endeavouring now to clear this matter up. Until such time, (soon I hope), as we know how the transfer was made and then can determine whether it was properly executed or not it seems pointless to suggest that either the present, or past A.M.S. Executives have failed to represent the interests of students.

In fact, the problem as we now understand it suggests that the interests of the students were foremost in the minds of those who transferred the funds. After commissioning an architect to design a theatre, the present amount now in dispute, $32,000, was left in the fund. However, the architect had designed a building that cost about 2.5 million dollars. It seemed unrealistic at that time, and could only seem more so now, that students were ever going to raise that kind of money. The project was shelved accordingly. Meanwhile, back at the University Centre students were stuck with a $500,000 bill for a building that we knew was going to be built. In order to offset the high student interest fee that would accompany such a large commitment, the Theatre Building Fund was transferred to the University Centre. Regardless of how the transfer was made, it should be easy to understand the rationale behind it and that it was motivated by a desire to help protect student interests.

I would like to emphasize if the transfer turns out to have been mismanaged, we could do everything in our power to reestablish the Theatre Building Fund. Even if we are successful though, the issue will not have been resolved. Somewhere students will have to find the money to complete the theatre and somewhere we will have to find an extra $32,000 for the University Centre. What would the Journal suggest? A higher student interest fee?

The issue will boil down to one point. How are the interests of students best protected? I'm not so sure that the interests of the students are really best represented in establishing building funds that in realistic terms we are unlikely to meet or that they are best represented by asking the students for another $32,000. I hope the Journal will weigh the arguments on each side carefully. It will need the thoughtful consideration of all students.

Vice-President (Operations)

Henry leDope was a mountie. He always got his man, usually. There is one instance where he got his own star instead.

It seems that, early in his career, he was doing some undercover work in a Physics class. He there overheard the pinko silly prof say: "It seems that this star here was responsible for the explosion that caused the Crab Nebula, which is bigger than a breadbox." So leDope set out to bring the friend to Justice.

Bugs were placed in all the neighboring stars. Haley's Comet was sent around to snoop. Large magical beasties sent back important information.

The plot thickened. All that the bugs picked up was some rather silly music. "Sounds like a bunch of marbles doing a can-can at a Ukranian wedding", said one fellow.

Finally, evidence began to collect. Haley's Comet began sending back messages like: "Guilty", "Two no Sugar", and other old jokes.

Tormented by the magical beasties, the star finally confessed. It was quiet in the packed court. In the juror's box, the jurors were boxing and leaping around. Great choruses of snails sang "Nearer my God to thee" as the Titanic went down for the third time. An ominous Diddy-wah-Diddy came from under a chair.

"Guilty", said the judge.

"But the trial hasn't begun yet!" cried the star.

"Thirty years for contempt" roared the judge, with his feet in a marshmallow.

Sentence was passed on the star, and Henry leDope was awarded a large and very shiny medal, with orders to keep it hidden. Canadian content.

French Canadian Folklore at la Gallerie Victoria

J. Atwood

This past Sunday night at La Gallerie Victoria, an audience cross-sectioning Queen's students, RMC boys, and ladies and gentlemen were quietly transported to Quebec. The atmosphere was simplicity itself: candles flickering on small tables gathered in one corner, posters arranged on the wall, hot apple cider brewing near the door, and French Canadian music eminating everywhere. Paul Demers, the French Canadian folksinger, put the audience instantly at ease with his genuine quality, and then carried them away with his array of songs--some from French Canadian folklore, most from his own experience.

This talented young singer who lives in Ottawa has performed at Algonquin College, where he studied for a year, at Carleton and other places in the region. Paul has only been folksinging in front of audiences for a year, but his ability on the guitar and his wide repertoire of songs almost belie this. His enjoyment throughout the performance was obvious and was reflected in the audience. Whether silent in reverie, swaying to the easy rhythm of romantic folklore, or joining in foot-stomping hand-clapping chants, the audience partook and enjoyed Sunday night's performance at La Gallerie Victoria.

This performance was a follow-up to the series of French Canadian folksingers presented in the same spirit this past fall. Future performances will be announced on posters around campus, and the next immediate performance is scheduled for March 7th, the first Sunday of that month, at 9:30 pm. It's sure to be a pleasurable experience you're bound to enjoy.

Change of pace

ZUMA
Neil Young with Crazy Horse
Asylum Records and Tapes. 1975
Larry Nightingale

A casual listening to Neil Young's early 1975 album, Tonight's the Night, would lead one to suspect that Young is a dangerous depressive who should be kept under strict observation lest he harm himself. If your feelings about Young's recent career activities coincide at all with that above, then you will be very surprised to find that Zuma is the livliest and most enjoyable album Young has produced in years. The songs are similar to those of the Harvest and After the Gold Rush period, but with more of the driving guitar work that characterized his earlier records. Like most people, I've only been able to take recent Neil Young work in small and infrequent doses. Zuma, however, begs to be played over and over again, loud. Songs like Don't Cry No Tears, and Lookin' for a Love deserve to be top-40 hits if there is any justice left at all in AM programming.

Young's guitar work has never been flashy or ostentatious. His simple chord patterns can be boringly dull and repetitive when Young is in his more self-indulgent phases, or can be, as in Cortez the Killer, Danger Bird, and Drive Back, beautifully constructed rocking blues. Very American, very natural, and very good.

Crazy Horse, Young's off-again, on-again back up band, have never been crisper. Since founding member Danny Whitten died two years ago they haven't been crisp, period, till now.

Hard driving rockers do not alone make a good record. Balance and depth are added to Zuma by the addition of two gentle acoustic songs - Pardon my Heart, and Through the Sails, the latter boasting background harmony by all three of Crosby, Stills and Nash.

Although not the most articulate of men, Neil Young has long been respected as one of the most intelligent and sensitive people involved in the west coast rock scene. More than anything else though, it can be said that Young's work is un-pretentious and honest. This honesty leads Young to produce both painfully depressing songs that wallow in a sea of self-pity, and brilliant songs full of sunlight and simplicity, with fluid phrasings and tight instrumentations. Zuma, luckily is composed almost entirely of songs that fall into the latter category.

THE POLAR BEAR EXPRESS

M. Daub

I should have known better. After all, Bud Macanally had warned me. Old hard rocks don't lie. That much I've learned. He'd muttered something over the hamburgers one day in Haileybury.

"Nothin' but a tourist trap so far's I'm concerned."

I didn't know Bud that well then so I couldn't be sure. Anyhow, I'd gone ahead with it. That explained the stay in Cochrane. It was at the bottom end of the line which was the only thing justifying its existence. At least, so far as I could tell. They had three Chinese restaurants though. Only ones in town. It was too long a night.

The morning started worse. My clock was 30 minutes slow. The cab was on time. I left my toothbrush and other stuff behind in the charge.

"Goin' up Black Rapids to try your luck?"

Me? Maybe I looked that way. What with the logger's shirt, two weeks beard and knapsack. But I'd never been into the bush, let alone "tried my luck". Would have needed all that just to stay alive.

"No. Why? What's up there?"

"Oh, ah, pretty good fishing."

Fishing my ass! I found out a couple of hours later they'd made a possible moly strike there.

He was disappointed. I could tell. But I made the train on time.

It was a bright, clear morning that day and the steam curled up from under the cars. Nice green and yellow ones with a happy bear and the Ontario government's crest on the sides. It was the finest train I'd ever seen.

Most of the people were tourists. The train was jammed with them, it being the excursion and all. Felt for all the world like Leacock's Mariposa Bette until I realized I was one of them. They didn't think so though. Made the same mistake as the taxi driver. After awhile I just ignored the cameras and the whispers.

The coffee and donuts were good but it didn't help sitting in the cold car so long. Finally, though, we'd gotten started.

The first fifty miles was nothing but bush. Close up to the tracks, too. So was the next fifty. The one big stop was the Ontario Hydro dam. Everyone took pictures of it and the train. I took one of the tracks ahead going off into the bush. Wanted to be realistic.

By the time the end of the line rolled around I was thinking a lot about old Bud. It was about a hundred and ninety miles in all. Solid bush all the way. Still wasn't ready to quit mind you. The place must have something. They couldn't have kept screwing everybody over the years.

Most of the train headed down towards the river. You can walk it. That's if you don't mind getting a little dusty. Not that the sidewalks aren't paved. It's the streets. And the dust carries.

I took one of the trucks that passes for taxis and we bumped down to the Moosonee Lodge. The room they gave me was nice except for the view. It looked back over the shacks and yards, not out on to the river.

By the time I'd unpacked and rested a bit, the hordes had all gone to the Factory. That meant I could take my time getting over. Crees running big Rupert House canoes with fifteen-horse Johnsons took you across for a buck. The sun was up but the wind and the water made it cold.

About the time we got there, I started feeling uneasy. I suppose it had been around all day and I hadn't noticed. Maybe the white-washed buildings with the heating pipes on stilts gave it a consciousness. I'm still not sure. But I knew I was alone. Isolated. Oh sure, there were people and houses and all that. But somehow, up there, they didn't give the reassurance they do elsewhere. The trees and the water and rocks all told you it was mostly theirs. They won out.

Pretty soon the tourists all went back to catch the train home. And I sat down in the little church there to struggle with it. Up close, naked, stripped of the veneer, we're alone, apart, isolated. So it seemed you'd have to be yourself if it was going to work at all. Course that meant you'd have to do most of it too. The living I mean. Still that was a fair bargain, all things considered.

I finally struggled back to the hotel, shaky from the effort. Even though it was dinnertime, nobody was around, even inside. Except for the guy across the hall. His door was open and he looked hard at work. Pencil-writing, like me. Almost asked him if he was working on something. I didn't though. Guess the wanting to be alone won out.

I ate that way and then went to check on the boat ride to James Bay. For some reason I'd wanted to go there. They'd be going at nine next morning. I was welcome for five bucks.

Back in the room I tried to write it down. But it didn't come right. It wouldn't until much later. So I propped the feet up on the windowsill and watched the sunset. Most beautiful I'd ever seen. Anyone argues, I've got pictures. A sunrise would have been more poetic, I guess, but that sunset will do me just fine for awhile.

The boat went and I was on it. So were a couple from New Jersey but they didn't talk. It was too warm and nice for that. We just went down river for maybe two hours, turned around when we hit the Bay and came back. Same scenery. Water and trees. Uncompromising, never pretty, always harsh.

I checked out of the hotel right away, even though the train didn't leave for another hour. Wanted to stop at the Bay store for a tent and some other stuff. It didn't open until 1:30. So I sat on the front steps and stared at the new horde that had just arrived on the morning train. They were on their way down to the waterfront.

The Bay didn't sell the tent I wanted. But I did buy a necklace from a woman outside the high school.

The southbound left on time that afternoon and I slept as much as I could. We stopped a lot. For mail, to drop supplies. It was the run with all the boxcars and character they talk about in the travel brochures. You'd never see it though if you took the excursion. And there still wasn't any scenery, even at that speed. If you want that from a train, take the Algoma Central out of the Soo up towards Hearst. Or maybe the CP's Rockies trip. On good authority, believe me! A couple of Yank train freaks dualled riding experiences for my benefit. Late in the trip, just before Cochrane

For sure don't take the Polar Bear Express from Cochrane to Moosonee. At least not for that reason. You won't see anything. Take it from me, or old Bud if you think I'm lying. It's really a tourist trap. Besides which you'll spoil it. You'll make it so a man can't feel alone there anymore. And if he can't, he won't be able to see himself close-up. And that would be a much bigger loss than any picture of an Indian in a canoe you might miss.

So leave it for those who are looking Just pass through Cochrane on your way east or west. Maybe take a picture of Chimo the bear as you do. The government won't miss your money and the rest of us will take care of the Indians

A talk with Esker Mike,

It's something you have to get at from inside - mann

An interview
by Alan Mann

The Queen's Drama Department's next major production is Esker Mike and his wife, Agiluk. Esker Mike is not only written by a Canadian, but Herschel Hardin, the author of the play, is a Queen's graduate. Esker Mike marks a return to an old Queen's drama tradition, that of doing Canadian works.

The play is rather deeply about human needs, fears, and desires, written in a cool, almost poetic style that reveals but does not exploit the fiercely human powers beneath the surface.

The Journal went to Rod Robertson, director of the production to discuss this play.

Journal - Why, with so many other plays around, did you choose to do Esker Mike and his wife Agiluk?

Robertson - Well, I've read many Canadian plays and decided I wanted to do something in the genre this time around. I had in mind another one that had only three characters and I felt it would be unfair to provide opportunities for only three actors. That's a mechanical reason. Other than that it has to do with your own personal affinity - you must find something you like and feel a rapport with.

I read this play three times before I decided to do it. The first time around I felt really baffled by it. I read it again and was a little less baffled, but then the third time I found myself becoming quite attached to it. but like a love affair, I'm not so sure why I'm in love with the play.

Journal - You've had a few cast changes along the way. Has that changed your original interpretation of the play?

Robertson - We have had some changes, but they have had a very minimal effect on the overall concept of the play. On the other hand, I went to audition with some pre-conceived notions of what I was looking for. When it came to the casting, I found that the people who were there gave me new ideas. It's been very refreshing that way.

Journal - On first reading, Esker Mike would seem to be a battle of ideals in the North. Is this going to present a problem to a Southern audience?

Robertson - There might be a problem about the play, not because of that, but sometimes the language is a little different than our own, somewhat stylized, and also the characters don't get at some of the problems as directly as we do, at least in the drama and literature we're most familiar with. I've spoken to someone who's had experience in the North, and this is not an unrealistic play moment by moment. As you put it together it is not a slice of life, but moment by moment, it reflects vividly the approach many people in the North have to their own problems.

The characters are real people dealing with real problems. Their ways of looking at them and their resolutions to them are different, but I don't find them as much ideals or symbols as I did when I first read the play.

Director Rod Robertson-"like a love affair" - mann his wife Agiluk, and friend

you have to do a lot of very personal work - mann

Journal - So the smooth, slow pace and the lack of on-stage violence is in a sense real of the North?

Robertson - There is no great overt emotion or violence there. Eskimos don't show their emotions outwardly as much as we might here. They laugh things off even though we might be dealing with very serious and profound problems; a mother and her children; marriage, and the very fact of murder.

Then we went to Jon Frizzell and Nancy Palk to get their points of view.

Journal - In Esker Mike you two play the roles of a Northern trapper and an Eskimo woman. Do you find these roles difficult to portray since your own personal experience is so far removed from the lives of the characters?

Frizzell - I think an actor has that problem with any particular role. Here it's exaggerated by the ethnic change.

Palk - The problem is that we aren't Eskimo. I don't know how an Eskimo thinks. You can try and make yourself believe that deep in soul a White is basically the same as an Eskimo, but I don't think that's true. You can't go out and use your technique acting. It's something you have to get at from inside.

Frizzell - It's an incredibly difficult play to act simply because of the way he's chosen to portray the different vignettes of their lives. We never see any major moments in the play. It tends to skirt around the conflict and deals with the scenes in an unusual way.

The play is about Agiluk not having my children, but we never see the moment she actually tells me. The play opens with me telling someone else. You always see things a few scenes before and then a few scenes after; we never get peaks. You're never doing the usual performance gags, you're never exploding, never crying, never dying. It's a role you have to do a lot of work on, a lot of very personal work.

Palk - And Hardin must have wanted it like this,but it's a really a hard role to do because of it, because the mood is more stable than in most plays.

You don't get that much in the script It's so bare, and the thing is, Agiluk's already made her decision before the play even starts, and so I'm working from that decision to the realization of that decision.

Journal - Are you getting much help from the director?

Palk - He lets you find it on your own, which sometimes you can think isn't going to work well, but Rod makes you do work on your own, which is what you have to do really, which is by far the most rewarding. If you work at it, then you feel as if you've done something.

Frizzell - He gives the actor a marvellous skeleton. He tells you where to go, and somehow it's right. It gives me a framework of movement, and in that framework I can do the work an actor does on his own.

Rod works on a very professional level. He expects that the actor is doing the subtext, the emotional parts of the work is fitting them into the framework. There were times I knocked my head against the floor, but as I'm working more and more and finding Esker Mike emotionally, I realize that the Director has given me the right places to be in and they're aiding me in finding the emotional subtext.

Journal - How does Hardin's idea of the North relate to your own?

Frizzell - I have to believe he's writing his vision of the North. It may even be a fantasy. I don't know if he's ever been there, but I've adopted his ideas as my own.

Palk - It's no longer a question of the North, but it's the North of the play. It's the play's world we're dealing with.

Frizzell - Can I ask a question? Are you going to edit this? I just realized what an editor can do to you. I wish it to be said that if I look like a jerk, he did it, Alan Mann made me look like a jerk I'd like to read this before you print it so I can hear how I sound.

Palk - It's not how you sound, it's how I sound.

Journal - Don't worry. I'll edit it.

Frizzell - I want to sound absolutely brilliant.

Palk - That'd be nice.

The performance runs February 5,6,7,12,13,14 at 8:30p.m. in Convocation Hall. Tickets are $2 on Thursdays, $1 for students, and $3 on Fridays and Saturdays, $2 for students, available at the Drama Desk, 547-6291, and at the door.

Electra tomorrow night

Queen's University Department of Drama, in association with St. Lawrence College Department of Theatre Arts proudly presents Joseph Chaikin's production of ELECTRA.

In creating this contemporary version of the Electra legend, Chikin has collaborated with poet Robert Montgomery, whose play SUBJECT TO FITS was the hit of the recent off-Broadway season.

In a naked arena, shorn of all inessentials, Chaikin has tapped the root of this most primal family drama. Electra and her exiled brother Orestes kill their mother, Clytemnestra, in order to revenge her killing of their father, Agamemnon, fifteen years before. The play examines the identity crisis caused by this violent act and explores the transformation which the human soul undergoes when subjected to the irreversible acts necessitated by obedience to absolute values.

Joseph Chaikin has contributed more to and had greater impact on the New York Theatre than anyone in the past decade with the possible exception of Joseph Papp. Obie award winning actor (for Galy Gay in Brecht's Man is Man). Toni award winning director (for America Hurrah), founder of the Open Theatre, and member of the original Living Theatre, Chaikin is generally acknowledged to be New York's foremost experimental director.

The only Eastern Ontario performance of ELECTRA is scheduled for Wednesday, 4 February 1976 at 8:30 p.m. in MacArthur Auditorium, Union St. at Sir John A. MacDonald Blvd. Tickets are $3.50 and available at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre, 547-6194.

Stringband show was good music

Cynthia David

In spite of competition from other activities on Saturday night, a good crowd appeared at McArthur Auditorium to hear Stringband, a three-person group from Toronto. Labouring under great technical difficulties, the band finally proceeded with the aid of a "cannibalized stereo."

Displaying variety and flair, the musicians worked their way through Canadian folk music from the prairies to the east coast. French-Canadian ballads and the blues of the 30's provided something for everyone. Most of Stringband's music is original, written by Bob Bossin and Marie-Lynn Hammond.

Bossin played the banjo for most of the performance, wearing one red and one blue sock, to match his suspenders. He also explained the background of the songs, and at one point read aloud from the 1931 Boy Scout Handbook concerning Self-Conservation, which even the Engineers in the back row understood. His voice didn't seem very powerful, although this could be the fault of the weak sound system. Hi played several solos, including, "Did you hear they busted the fiddle player?" (a true story), and generally added the right touch of humour to the polished performance

Marie-Lynn Hammond is perhaps the most versatile musician of the group, composer, singer and an excellent instrumentalist, Marie-Lynn plays guitar, banjo, autoharp and fiddle, an impressive accomplishment. Her strong voice, often resembling Sylvia Tyson's, was especially good in the traditional songs of Quebec, such as "La Prisonnier de Londres" with its tight harmony.

Soft-spoken Terry Hall, the group's third fiddler, has been with them only four months. He has played the fiddle "ever since I can remember" and his talent is obvious in the wild jigs and Hornpipes or in the St. Anne's Reel, an old Don Messer tune.

Stringband's sound is always clear and exciting, with rich harmonies which are essential to the style of music they play. Their casual, "What shall we do next" attitude creates a warm, friendly atmosphere.

The band has been together for five years. Based in Toronto, they play mainly in local colleges and coffee houses, and are frequent performers on the C.B.C. My favourite piece was "Devidoir", a French-Canadian spinning song. Its circular harmony displayed the group's skilful blend of voices which were always great even without instrumental accompaniment.

On the lighter side, Bossin's version of John Henry, written during The Mail Strike of '74 had the entire audience roaring with laughter. In this particular interpretation, John Henry is a mail sorter, who sings lines like, "Gonna die with a letter in my hand" or "Sortin's gonna be the death of me."

For the ultimate in audience participation, Bossin invited the audience to "Turn to someone beside you periodically and say Mind your own Business," to accompany this old Hank William's tune. Perhaps the most "appreciated" song of the evening was "Show me the Length..." which struck the final blow in the battle of the sexes with its moral, Judge not, lest you be judged!

The three musicians have produced two albums, the latest being "National Sounds", a diverse collection of Purely Canadian music which includes a tribute to that great Canadian institution Dief the Chief. Being uniquely Canadian, however, these albums are not available in most record stores. The injustice of it all!

Whatever, remember the name - Stringband. They'll be around for a long time to come.

A land of love; a tale with tunes

Brigadoon, the story of a mythical highland village that vanishes for one hundred years at a time, will open at the Grand Theatre this Wednesday, for a four day run. Presented by Queen's Musical Theatre, the production will feature Robert Hanks, Laurie Eaton, George Pothitos, Hugh Glass and Glen Piper. Set design is by Bruce Kyle and choreography by Jill Hodkinson.

Basically a new treatment of an old show, Brigadoon will be performed on a multi-leveled set, where changes of mood and local will be indicated by light. Director David Fanstone said a positive benefit of this type of staging is that it quickens the pace of an otherwise slow moving show by eliminating house curtains between scenes and allowing the case to play from scene to scene with little interruption. Costumes will be traditional and colourful, both to dress the set and provide the magic of a land long forgotten, Brigadoon.

Brigadoon will run from February 4 to February 7 at the Grand Theatre, with tickets availabe at the Grand Theatre Box Office, both pick-up and phone reservations. Curtain time is 8:30 p.m.

Mom's Menu

Your Mother

There are some basic utensils which no kitchen should be without. You must be accurate when it comes to cooking in order to assure that what you begin to make is what you end up with. Measuring spoons and cups are a necessity for this reason. The measuring cup should be made of heat-resistant glass. For mixing, you must have at least one large bowl, and preferably a set of bowls of different sizes. A long-handled wooden spoon is best for mixing, especially when stirring hot liquids. When cooking, you will need a large frying pan with a cover, a large pot and a small saucepan, both with covers, a roasting pan with a cover, and a casserole dish with a cover For baking, a cookie sheet, cake tins (either round or square) and pie plates are necessary. A spatula, strainer, cutting board, sharp cutting knives, grater and rolling pin are utensils which cannot really be substituted (unless you use a wine bottle in place of the rolling pin).

I included the price of most of these utensils in my $10-$15 for weekly food and sundries, buying things which I needed one at a time. There are many other kitchen supplies which are useful and can save time, but if you want to save money instead, this list is the very minimum of utensils needed for cooking well.

Macaroni and Cheese (Preparation time - 1 hour, serves 6)

1½ cups elbow macaroni
3 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. flour
½ tsp. salt
dash pepper
2 cups milk
¼ cup chopped onion
2 cups cubed sharp cheddar cheese
1 tomato sliced

Cook macaroni in boiling salted water till tender, drain. In saucepan, melt butter Blend in flour, salt and pepper. Add milk. Stir until thick and bubbly. Add onion and cheese. Stir until cheese is melted.

In a 1½ quart casserole dish, mix macaroni and sauce Sprinkle tomato with salt and arrange slices on top. Bake at 350 degrees for 35 to 40 minutes.

Vegetable flavoured macaroni may be substituted for the plain pasta type. Leftover ham or wieners may be cut up in small pieces and added to macaroni before cooking. Or serve the casserole with leftover sliced meat. Meat is not necessary for this meal, however, because cheese is a good substitute for it.

Also serve the macaroni with a salad with French Dressing and bread (crusty French if possible).

French Salad Dressing (makes ¾ cup)

½ cup salad oil
2 tbsp. vinegar
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. sugar
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. paprika
½ tsp. dry mustard
dash cayenne

Combine ingredients in jar. Cover and shake well.

An experience like meditating

Tom MacGregor

"An experience very much like meditating" is how Bill Nichols of the Film Department describes watching a Japanese film. His interest has led to a Japanese Film series on campus this year and to his editing of booklet to compliment the series under the title of Guide to the Japanese Film.

Nichols developed his interest while spending a couple of years in Los Angeles. Not only has the city one of the largest Japanese populations outside Japan but it is also home to most of the distributing houses for the Japanese film in North America. Fortunately geographical and diachronic language change has made it so that the larger part of the Japanese audience aimed at can no longer speak the language of the homeland. Hence these films are available to us all in English subtitles. However there are many aspects of Japanese society which are hard for us to understand and Nichols hopes his book will make this kind of cinema a little easier understood.

Japan became one of the world's most industrial nations in less time than any other country. Together with psychological repercussions from World War II and the bombing of Hiroshima, this industrial change has brought a deep self-analysis upon the Japanese people. In 1970 this was brought startling to the attention of the world by novelist Yukio Mishima's junshi, or double suicide, in front of an assembly of Japan's Eastern Defense Forces. His last statement was that there are values "more important than life". The Japanese cinema expresses these ideas with equal vehemence.

The centuries of feudalism which only recently ended have installed in the Japanese people a sense of giri, or obligation to the state. In the modern society this sense of duty must be transferred elsewhere such as into the company or the cliental that supports the man. Many films center around the conflict between giri and ninjo, or human feelings arising from the modern man's own desires. To the Japanese of the past the ultimate loyalty was always the giri, but the modern man is not so sure.

This conflict also becomes a conflict within the strongest unit of Japanese society, the family. One article in the guide claims that the children are brought up with a strong sense of guilt about any pain they have caused the parents. Hence the young adult has a need to expiate this guilt. This term, two of the films look at family life. Ozu's film End of Summer will have been screened over the weekend which takes an almost Zen-like look at change in the contemporary family. On the other hand the next film The Ceremony by Oshima uses the family unit as a metaphor for the whole changing society and what giri and ninjo mean today.

As the American film returns again and again to the times of the American west to illustrate contemporary ideals and ethics, so the Japanese return to the days of the samurai warriors. Actually the samurai warrior is closer to the state Don Quixote so ardently sought. The samurai were a socially superior class of warrior bound strongly to a code of honour called bushido or way of the warrior. The samurai were supposed to welcome death and be the bravest of all fighters. If he ever broke with bushido, he had only one redemption, harakiri or as it is properly called, seppuku. Unlike our coward's way out, seppuku is considered an heroic act. The last two films of the series center around this tradition: Kurosawa's Seven Samurai and Misumi's Lightning Swords of Death.

In all the reviews and interviews in the guide the most praised aspect of the Japanese cinema is that it is an amazingly pure art form. The strong literary and theatre traditions such as Noh and Kabuki seem have influence film very little. One common theme in the films on the modern society is its increasing Americanization yet the American film seems also to have had little effect on the film industry. This alone would make the films interesting.

This booklet has opened a whole fascination with the Japanese culture and cinema. Having the advantage of seeing a pure art form as well as a culturely different one is an opportunity not to be passed up.

Pryde in your plants

Rod Pryde

Plants add that little extra to a house, making it seem more like a home. Keeping plants verdant is very easy and yet one can always go to a friend's house and see plants that are dying because they haven't been cared for properly. People so often go out and buy a plant and assume that it will take care of itself and they can sit back and enjoy it. Obviously, this will not happen. Once a week, this column will deal with one aspect in the basic care of plants; watering, light, temperature, repotting, fertilizer and soil, pruning and propagation. Each week the culture of a specific plant will be discussed. If you have any questions about your plants, write in and they will be answered in the next column.

Queen's Swim and dive

Women lack number Men strong individuals

This past weekend served to be an exciting and eventful one for the Queen's swimming and diving teams. Friday night saw a condensed men's swim team travel to Ottawa to compete in the McGill, Ottawa, and Laval Tri-meet. Although the five Queen's swimmers Ireland, Pearson, Coldsen, Cassidy, and Davies were swimming exhibition events purely for practice their presence at the meet was quite noticeable. Veterans John Pearson and John Ireland contributed their usual excellence to dominate the events in which they swam. Team Captain John Ireland swam an incredible 200 yard Individual Medley with an approximated time of 2:14 to take the event, Rookies Andreas Cordsen and Roger Cassidy swam well too but special mention must be given to Ken Davies. Kenny has been burdened with a bad knee for the better part of the season but managed to put it all together this weekend blasting the 50 and 100 yard freestyle events.

Bright and early Saturday morning the mens and womens swim teams took off to York University while the men's diving team took on the powerful Toronto Varsity Blues at Toronto. Following a lackadaisical performance the previous week against very strong Plattsburg and McGill divers, Queen's high flying duo cleaned up their act against arch rival University of Toronto. In the one meter competition veteran Karry "Boog" Powell took first place a mere 5 points ahead of rookie Rob Laing who placed second. Rob turned the tables in the 3 meter competition dunking Kerry by one point, the difference coming on a very strong inward one and a half somersault and a newly learned back dive with a half twist. The one-two showing in both events was particularly gratifying since the men competed without veterans Fred "Rock" Tallin, Jim Stone, and Mary Lou Faskin.

The scene at York University on Saturday was an exciting one as Queen's men demolished the weaker York team by a score of 53 to 32. The Queen's Gals team suffered a defeat by one point which was determined by the final 400 yard freestyle relay. Despite the gallant efforts by the girls, they simply did not have enough swimmers to fill all of the events, thus resulting in a defeat.

Several notable performances were turned in by the girls. In the 400 meters free Cindy Whitley came up with a personal best with a converted time of approximately 5:50. Although only training since Christmas, swimmer Vicki Troop came a close second in the 200 I.M. and gave a strong effort in the 50 meters freestyle. The 100 meters fly was dominated by Carol Kennedy as she won the event by a good margin. Cathy Brace gave another excellent performance this weekend as she came first in the 50 freestyle, 100 freestyle, and 200 meters breaststroke - not to mention a strong 100 freestyle leg in the 400 meter medly relay.

The Men's team put on another fine display, swimmer star Tim Dennis brought first place points in his three individual events and swam a strong leg in the Medley relay which also was won by Queen's. John Pearson had a great day as usual too - bringing back first place points in the 50 meter freestyle, (beating second) 200 meter butterfly again nosing out another team mate. This time it was John Ireland finishing the 200 meter butterfly 8 tenths of a second behind Pearson to take second place. John Ireland also brought back a first place finish in the 500 meter freestyle. Swimmer Bruce Ripley picked up a second place finish in an exhausting 1000 meter swim. The crowd came to its feet during the final leg of the 200 meter freestyle event as teammate Martin "All right!" Demmers came neck and arm to pick up a second in the event. Again Ken Davies blasted a fine 50 and 100 meters freestyle to pick up valuable points for the team. Other fine swims were contributed by Andreas Cordsen and Roger Cassidy.

Unfortunately two of the finest swimmers could not compete this weekend due to academic pressures and injuries. It is hoped that both Joe Schnittker and Wayne Sereburn will be back this coming weekend as both the men's team, women's team as well as the diving team will off to Montreal to compete against McGill.

Badminton Gals clinch second

Di Edwards

Queen's women's Intercollegiate Badminton team had to face some pretty tough competition at the OWIAA meet at Brock this weekend, but, true to form, they fought hard and came out near the top. Queen's ended up in second place with a total of 38 points, an unfortunate 20 points behind Western, which seems to be this year's league leader. The aim of the game for this weekend was to try and take points away from Western and although Queen's did not fully achieve this, they managed to chalk up their fair share of victories over the other schools.

Fourth place singles player Betsy Carey and 6th singles Bev Koski led the singles play by each winning 3 out of 4 of their singles matches. Both lost THAT ONE FATAL MATCH TO Western but played well enough to trounce Waterloo, Guelph, and Toronto in the other matches. Second singles Dianna Edwards and 5th singles Sandy McFarlane both won two of their four singles matches–Sandy defeated Toronto and Waterloo while Dianna was the only singles player who managed to beat her opposition from Western.

Daphne Meredith, 1st singles, and Sandy Koerner, 3rd singles, although they both played very well some of their opposition played just a little bit better. Nevertheless, neither Queen's player walked away without a victory.

The badminton Gals made up for their less than perfect record in singles by achieving a number of victories in doubles. The third doubles team of Sandy McFarlane and Bev Koski were the leaders of the Queen's team with all wins except one loss to Western. Both girls swear that Western will bite the dust next time they meet.

The first doubles team of Daphne Meredith and Di Edwards were triumphant over Western and Toronto, both of which had beaten them consistently before Christmas and these victories offset the 2 losses the girls had against Waterloo and McMaster. Second doubles team of Sandy Koerner and Betsy Carey met the team's aim by soundly defeating the Western doubles team but although they played well in their other games, their opponents always seemed to have that fine edge over them, something which the girls should try to remedy at the next tournament.

The tournament set-up has been changed around somewhat since last term. Queen's is playing in the "A" flight, or top half of the league this term, and this standing has been based on the number of wins and losses made in the two tournaments before Christmas. This means that all the best teams of the league (Queen's, Western, Guelph, Toronto, Waterloo and part of McMaster) play each other while the other half or "B" flight teams play among themselves. At any rate, competition is very stiff indeed.

The next badminton meet, the OWIAA Finals, will be held in two weeks time at McMaster. Queen's hopes to hold on to their second place standing but competition will be tough. Since the girls will be losing their two top players, Daphne and Diana, to the Ontario Winter Games, the team's player-manger Gayle Raycraft and substitute Irene Baron are practising hard to be in top form when they take over the number one and two spots next tournament. These two girls are playing extremely well and the Queen's team feels quite confident they can maintain their present standing.

As of this weekend, Queen's badminton has launched into their second term of competition and so far, with coach Bernie Houghton's excellent work, they have started out quite well but with even greater hopes for the finals in two weeks time.

Queen's 3rd Gals Arch

Only 100 points separate the first three teams following the first round in OWIAA archery held Saturday at Toronto University. In first place is Western with 1889 points. Toronto is second with 1837 and Queen's third with 1788. Guelph occupies fourth place with 1651. Toronto is the defending indoor champion.

Top individual score for the day was 516 out of a possible 600, by Linda Kazienko of Guelph. Queen's Pat Paulin is tied for second place with a Toronto team member, having shot 488.

Rounds two and three will be shot at Western next weekend. Competition will be keen as the championship is still anybody's. We are looking for a fine performance from the Queen's team.

X-Country Ski Gals

The X-country Ski teams travel to north of Ottawa this weekend to defend their last year's All-Ontario skiing championships. Queen's is hosting the event at Nakertok ski club, Quebec.

It's been a good season, with the team winning the University trophy in the 31 km. Muskoka Loppett on Jan. 10th, their first race. Derek Evans, Rob Macintosh and Gord Sciecky were the first 3 Queen's racers in, and their combined times beat out Guelph, U of T, Western and Laurentian. The following weekend saw a no-contest meet against RMC in which Queen's skiers captured first to tenth positions excepting RMC's 3rd place. On the 24th the team travelled to a highly competitive race at the Finnish camp in Udora and had generally good results compared to other university skiers, although the high skill level of skiers from the many Finnish clubs was apparent. Dave Ophel and Derek Evans respectively captured 3rd and 4th places in the Junior Mens 12 km. race

This past weekend the gaels participated in the U of T Invitational at Midland, against a strong showing of U of T, Western Guelph, RMC, Trent and York skiers. In the individual event Saturday, Queen's managed a 3rd, 5th, 10th and 17th, respectively by Rob Macintosh, Derek Evans, Dave Ophel and Matt Kirby but that placed them 3rd behind Guelph (1st) and U of T (2nd). On Sunday the first relay team of Macintosh, Evans, and Ophel placed 2nd of 11 teams and the B team, composed of Kirby, Screcky and Keith Crawford also performed well. Much thanks is due to coach Jake Edwards. Also racing for Queen's X-country Ski Gaels are Phil Morrison, Rick Booth and Jim Smedly

Best of luck to them in a challenging meet this coming weekend.

Hockey Gaels...

Friday Golden, Saturday the Blues

Tom Shand

Gaels played heads up hockey for 4½ periods this weekend and came out with two points against the visiting Varsity Blues. Gaels won the game on Friday night by a 4 to 2 count but fell prey to the Blues the following afternoon 8 to 2. The split elevated Toronto to the top spot in the O.U.A.A. East while Queen's remained entrenched in third spot with a 7 win, 7 loss record.

The team played before a "nook and cranny" crowd on Friday night as Jock Harty Arena was overflowing with people who actually clapped and "Oil-Thighed" for most of the game. The first of the three goals that were scored when the Gaels were on the power-play was notched by the Blues' Graham Wise who surprised Clyde Harris on a 30 ft. slapshot. The Gaels redeemed themselves when Chris Clark scored his first of the year and Willie Wing put the Gaels ahead 2-1 at 11.45 of the first. Earl Moulton stole a play right out of the Detroit Red Wings' playbook as he rifled a shot into the Varisty corner (al la Sid Abel) and Willie kindly accepted the gift and deposited it quickly behind Blues' goaltender Mark Logan.

Earl "the pearl" Moulton having by far his best game of the season then put the men in gold up by two at 9.05 of the second period as he and Ned McIntyre worked the puck around well as they moved in on the Varsity defence. The play culminated with Moulton's turn-around shot which beat Logan who played exceptionally well all weekend. The second period ended in a 2-2 ties as Blues' Doug Herridge took advantage of a fine pick and'came around the net and slipped the puck inside the post before Harris could get there. Harris more than compensated for that score with some absolutely incredible saves on sure goals. Harris' anticipatory style of play and remarkable agility were most evident in a save off Blues' captain and the league's leading scorer Kent Ruhnke who in the split second which passed from the time he received the puck until he let go his shot had the view in front of him change from an inviting site of white mesh to a hulking impenetrable masked mass of arms and legs.

Tim HansonNo. 10 of the Golden Gaels scores the first Queen's goal in the game against Toronto on Saturday.

The Gaels dug deep in the final period to protect their narrow lead until Bill VanCamp put the game on ice with a well aimed empty net goal at 19.32 to make the final score 4-2. Much credit should be given to both teams and the officials for an excellent exhibition of collegiate hockey especially in the latter stages of the game when the crowd created heat steamed much of the strength from the skaters' legs.

Although the final score of Saturday's game was Queen's 2 Varsity 8, this score is hardly indicative of the type of game a good crowd at Jock Harty Arena witnessed that afternoon. Going into the final period the game was a see-saw battle tied at two apiece but two late period goals by the Blues changed the complexion of the game and Ruhnke's goal early in the third was the straw that broke the Camel's back.

In the first, the scorers were Fifield for the Blues on the powerplay followed 17 seconds later by Gaels' Tim Hansen. Doug Grills then put the Gaels ahead for the only time in the game at 18.31 of the first as he converted a Wing pass into a goal which barely crossed the goaline as Mark Logan made a valiant effort which just failed. Gaels' lead was short-lived as diminutive defenceman Charlie Hughes of the Blues responded with a goal at 18.48. Camel Harris was victimized on both the first two Blues' markers by a shot-blocking defence which only partially completed its job thereby leaving him helpless.

Chris Clarke of the Queen's team scores his first goal of the season and the first goal in the double header game against the Blues before a fanatic crowd Friday night.

The Blues took it to the Gaels in the second period but Camel Harris held them off until Wise and Fifield scored late in the period. The Gaels began to press in the third but were caught and the game was virtually over for them when Ruhnke scored at 5.03 of that period. This opened the floodgates for the Blues and for the Gaels there was no shelter from the storm. Linemates Herridge and Ruhnke scored midway through the final frame with their centreman John Precious assisting on both. The Blues eighth and final goal came at 19.37 on the powerplay with Ron Harris scoring his only goal of the series.

Gaels played well last weekend (except for the last 25 minutes) and proved that they are definitely as good as the Blues. However what has separated the two teams this season has been the Gaels' inability to put away the weaker teams. For instance Toronto defeated Ottawa 14-3 just a few days after the Gee Gees had upset the Gaels. Incidentally, Ruhnke, who picked up 2 goals and 3 assists on Saturday, scored six consecutive goals against Ottawa. The Gaels have a good chance to vindicate their Saturday afternoon shellacking when Trent visits Jock Harty Arena on Tuesday Feb. 4 at 8.00. (P.S. Remember R.M.C.!?!).

Basketball Gaels in a fog

Away off there you can see them; there through the fog of excuses and the haze of dissipating optimism. You can just catch a glimpse every now and then as the fog lifts momentarily. You didn't see? Well it was only for an instant, too short to tell if it was really they, but no matter, if you know who they are then you know what they are doing. It is the Gaels basketball team and they are re-enacting a familiar scenario, one in which they put up a valiant struggle all game long but in the final scene manage to lose comfortably. To their credit it hasn't been through lack of trying that the script has remained unchanged. Yet the sad truth is that try as they will it has remained unchanged: only the stage allers.

Last Saturday the stage was in Toronto and the score reflected the same story; 93-74 in favour of the Blues. For much of the second half a mere five points separated the teams. However, it was rarely less than five. Occasionally the Gaels would apply the pressure and close to within three, but then as before they dwindled their chances away on errant passes, bobbled receptions, missed shots and sloppy defence. Granted U of T tried to sustain the excitement with a few basketball misdemeanours themselves but Queen's obviously was the most skilled of the two in this department and conveniently supplied Toronto with a comfortable lead with the game nearing conclusion. High scorers for the Gaels were Andy Boniwell with 30, Derek Swinnard with 15 and Steve Mecredy with 10.

It has to hurt the Gaels terribly to have games like Toronto happen to them. Nobody likes to be 1 and 8. The best way to ease the hurt would be a change in the final scene, a victory instead of a loss. Tonight at 8:15 in Bartlett Gym the Gaels get a chance to re-write the script; a chance to inflict some damage of their own when they hose the Carleton Ravens. No one can ever accuse the Gaels of dying or of giving up and they certainly won't tonight. Come out and watch for yourself!

Men X-Country Ski

Saturday morning at 6.30 sharp the Men's and Women's X-country ski teams departed for a full weekend of ski races at Midland, north of Barrie. (We emphasize the word SHARP due to the renowned punctuality of coaches Jake Edwards and Anne Turnbull, the former being rumoured to have left tardy skiers behind on various occasions). The first day, in the individual competition the men skied a grueling 15 km. course and the women 5. It started out with a 120 m. uphill climb. The competition was stiff with an increase from 3 to 21 entries over last year. Competitors came from six other Ontario Universities: U of T and Trent captured 1st and 2nd positions in the individual competition with Western and U of T capturing 1st and 2nd in the relays.

Killer Kihl and Basher Bartlett placed 11th and 12th respectively with Go-Go Gilbert turning in a 13th. Breaky Broadhurst was forced to finish up the course on one ski due to a body pile-up encountered on a downhill hairpin turn, which resulted in one broken ski (not to mention the people). Gooey Gallagher met with resistance due to waxing problems and she still insists that the competition substituted crazy glue for the traditional X-country ski wax.

The team relay races were held on Sunday. Queen's first team assisting of Bartlett, Gilbert and Kihl turned in a 4th place, while a combined team of Broadhurst, Gallagher and a Trent skier came in 6th. Overall it was a fatiguing but fun-filled weekend and we're looking forward to the OWIAA's in Ottawa this Friday and Saturday. Special thanks to coaches Anne Turnbull and Jake Edwards for their extra effort put in throughout the season, and who have shared with us their vast experience and knowledge in the great sport of X-country skiing.

Gym. Gals

During the early hours of Saturday morning the small, but mighty Women's Gym team departed for Hamilton to take part in a dual meet hosted by McMaster's Women's team. The team, consisting of members Marian Birdsall, Sandy Prior, Lorraine, Diane McPherson, Wendy Clark, Dawn, and Marianne Bradynski, all competed well in all four events. The team is now looking forward to their final meet to be held at York on February 14.

Gals Volleyball Challenge Cup II

The Queen's Women's Volleyball team travelled to Sir Wilfred Laurier University to play a two day tournament of league play this past weekend. The Gals came out strong the first day winning 3 matches while dropping one to Western. The second day, however, 3 matches were lost for a disappointing end to the tournament.

The match scores were as follows:

Friday results: (Queen's score first)

Guelph	15-6	15-10
Brock	15-1	15-7
Wilfred Laurier	15-4	15-11
Western	3-15	14-16

Saturday Results.

McMaster	4-15	15-11	10-15
Waterloo	4-15	10-15
Windsor	10-15	13-15

Vees nip Gals

Atwood

The Queen's Women's Basketball team followed an unusual schedule this past week which saw them travelling to Ottawa on Tuesday and Thursday but left them void of action during the weekend. A brief summary appeared in Friday's Journal telling of the Gals drop from a second to a third place berth after their defeat at the hands of Ottawa University.

Two days after this disastrous game the Gaels travelled to Ottawa once again. This time their destination was Carleton University and their adversaries were the Laurentian University Voyageurs.

It is relevant to note that the coach of the Laurentian girls is Norm Vickey, the assistant National coach of the Canadian Women's Basketball team. Laurentian is currently the powerhouse in the OWIAA, carrying a few players who also double on the National team.

With this knowledge in hand Queen's went into the game with some idea of the huge task before them. It was also obvious from last year's experience that Queen's is one of the few Universities in the B-ball league who can give Laurentian a run for its money.

The game got underway rapidly, with Queen's potting the first basket and Laurentian getting the next 9. It wasn't until the score was 18-2 that Queen's could get the ball into the hoop again.

The Gals used a defence system which forced Laurentian to shoot from the outside - but the girls from Sudbury were hot, in the first quarter of the game their shooting was over 80 percent. It's hard for anybody to fight that statistic let alone a Queen's team whose shots are rolling around the rim and out again!!

At the end of the half the score stood at 37-16. Laurentian had outplayed Queen's the first 5 minutes of the game and outshot them the entire half. Queen's never let down once. In fact, if a game could be judged on the last 35 minutes the Gals were a better team. Their defence was working effectively (after some minor adjustments - to take into consideration the 'hot' shooting of a few Laurentian northerners). It was good to see a game in which the Gals never stopped hustling, never let their opponents relax.

A few comments from the Queen's team after the game indicated that the refing left something to be desired. Apparently there was quite a bit of body contact and body handling tactics under the boards which went unnoticed (and uncalled) by the officials. As a result Queen's had only 13 fouls, Laurentian only 11 a the end of the game, and neither team went into the bonus situation in either half.

The top scorers of the 61-44 game were Donna Roman with 18 and Marie Belanger with 13 both from Laurentian. Queen's notable scorers were captains Kathy Keely with 12 and Pat Quigley with 10 - Kim Headford had an unusually bad night scoring only 6 points and pulling down only 6 rebounds. The final shooting percentage was 33 percent for Queen's and 45 percent for Laurentian with both teams taking an equal number of shots from the floor.

Queen's Gals play tonight in Bartlett gym at 6:00 against Carleton.

Alpine Ski...

Gaels whiz into 1st; Gals 4th

The Men's and Women's Alpine ski team competed in the York University Invitational Dual Slalom this past weekend at Horseshoe Valley outside of Barrie. This was the third meet of the season and the men compiled another first while the women finished a respectable fourth. Both teams continue to lead the league in results, the men with three wins and the women with two wins and a fourth.

Top individual performances were turned in by Jane McGillvray and Bruce Cummings, both of whom placed third in their respective races. Other Queen's racers included Doug Christie, Tim Wardrop, Rob Dakers, Ian Neilson and Bill Hartman for the men and Jill Fuller, Heather Laidlaw, Stephanie Currie and Wendy Bethune for the women.

Considering the strong start that both teams are off to this year, the skiers are optomistic about this coming weekend when Queen's will host the OUAA—OWIAA championships at Mount Ste. Marie.

Tim Wardrop, wearing number 83 for the Queen's Alpine Ski Gaels charges out of the gates at Horseshoe Valley on Saturday. Queen's managed an overall 1st for the Gaels. The Gals did not fare so well and had to be satisfied with 4th spot.

Fencing Foiled again

Gleaming silver sabres flash in the steaming light from dusty overhead flourescent bulbs and the steely sound of steel-coloured steel steals throughout the still. Yes fans, it's FENCING night once again in Jock Harty Arena. Outside in the bitter cold, hostile-faced members of the International Foilers Union bar the way to the unsuspecting expectorating expectant spectator. These are the picket fencers that are resisting the use of the word "sabres" in the first line of this magnificent report that is so laden with sparkling wit, flashy prose, and crackling repartee that is lacking so much in the usual jock stories in the Queen's Urinal. But enough of these trifles. I will pay no further heed to the goon-squad strongarm tactics of these neanderthal brained lugnuts. Their one hope of gaining their misbegotten aims is in achieving the public attention they crave, and by denying this, I have out-foiled them. Well, that's all for this week folks. 10-4.

In the dual slalom race Bruce Cummings placed 3rd for the Queen's Gaels. Here he is shown in his race at Horseshoe on Saturday.

Track to Star Games

This past weekend a small contingent of members of the Queen's track and field team travelled down to the trials for the Toronto Star Games. The Star Games are very prestigious, internationally renown indoor meet, one of the premiere indoor competitions in the world. The Queen's representatives fared extremely well as all those that attended the trials qualified successfully.

In the sprints the Gaels won both the men's and women's 50 meter dash as Duncan Card and Freda Davies showed their class. The world record in these events was set at the Star Games for the men in 1972 and the women in 1973 so both Duncan and Freda will have plenty of competition come February 13. The other qualifiers were the mens 4 x 800 m relay. A very under-rated team, they broke the existing Queen's record by a devastating eleven seconds with personal bests across the board. The time of 7:40.1 was three seconds faster than last year's winning effort but only good enough for fourth place in the trials this year. Nevertheless, first place was only 1.3 seconds faster and next time, with more confidence now, the Gaels hope the story will be different. The team of Paul Spence (1:53.8), Bob McCormack (1:54.3), Jeff Giles (1:55.5), and Tony Verholven (1:56.5) do face some very fast opposition however as two individuals ran splits faster than the winning time at the national outdoor championships.

Two members of the 4 x 800 team actually doubled events with Paul also running a gutsy 1000 yards to finish 3rd in 2:17.3 and Bob McCormack covering the mile in 4:18.1. The rest of the track team ran on Saturday at London in the Western Open. The meet was poorly organized but several Gaels and Gals ran well. The individual results from the meet will be available in Friday's Journal.

AMS race: your choice

Three teams. Out of the murk of student apathy which last year produced an acclamation, three slates have put themselves in the running for the positions of AMS President and Vice-Presidents. Two of the teams, those led by Jamie Avis and Cindi Hall, represent established AMS platforms and points-of-view. The third, a socialist collective, has approached the election from an obviously different angle. All three are seriously aiming for the Executive; as this editorial will point out, it is not a question of two real teams and one phoney.

The Socialist Slate has emerged as the team around which the other two groups' viewpoints have circled. Instead of adding an element of jest, as was expected when the ten-member slate handed in its nomination, the Socialists have forced a wider perspective onto the plate of election issues. They refuse to consider the university's problems without connecting them to economic malaise in our society. Damning today's capitalist economic system, saying it has been injust to the poor and working members of society, the Socialists call for vast social change. Issues on which this election is being fought - universal accessibility and quality of education - are vital concerns. The Socialists espoused policies of free tuition and a student living stipend, but realistically acknowledge that society would not be tolerant of these except following great social transformation. To fight for this change, they want the Ontario Federation of Students to align with the labour movement. They realize that students and labour are not old time friends, but consider that the "struggle" against tuition hikes and against wage and price controls are aimed in the same positive direction.

Against this platform, Avis and Hall have staged their similar campaigns. Both these teams support the policies of free tuition and living stipend for students, but only as idealistic, long-term goals. Both are able to produce specific proposals for changes in the Ontario Student Award Programme so that less fortunate students may benefit from the programme. Neither have really come face to face with what the Socialists have made clear- that a sincere fight for free tuition and a living stipend entails a determined battle for vast social change.

The Socialist Slate has accused the university of not living up to its esteemed role of social critic. The problems of today's society are being overlooked by universities, the Socialists say, and programmes in women's studies, native peoples' studies, and limits to growth should be offered, but currently are not. Queen's students should be concerned with the prisons in the Kingston area, and should be working on penal reform. Issues as fundamental as these have unfortunately been passed over by Avis and Hall.

Funding of the universities, another of this year's pressing issues has the three teams split. Avis has said that current levels of university funding by the province are inadequate; he plans to oppose them. The Socialists explain that since learned individuals are one of society's luxuries funds to support them are reduced during periods of economic recession. Hall has expressed satisfaction with the current level of funding as it exceeds the rate of inflation. Her team considers it important to remember that other sectors of society may need government dollars more than the universities do.

Housing is an issue on which the teams' approaches become clear. Avis has suggested a Student Tenants' Association to combat landlords' unfair practices and high rents. Hall plans a study to determine student housing patterns. The Socialists are encouraging students to side with Sydenham Ward residents, many of whom are on fixed or low incomes, and form a tenants' association.

All three teams call for greater input into university decisions concerning tenure, course evaluation, and professors' teaching ability.

Unionization of faculty and staff has also been considered by all three teams. The Socialists encourage it among groups with lower incomes such as support staff and graduate students: they are less concerned for the Faculty. Hall's team is skeptical of it; afraid it would hurt the quality of education because of the possibility that seniority, not merit, would become the telling factor in lay-offs. Avis would neither oppose nor encourage unionization of faculty and staff; aware that such interference is illegal.

It is clear that all three teams have provided specific plans and proposals dealing with current student issues. Only the Socialists have been able to attach theirs to an ideology, something which ensures consistency among aspects of their platform. Their criticisms of the university and society are honest and impossible to ignore, and have been thought provoking.

It is unlikely that Queen's students will want to buy the entire Socialist programme. Chances are students will choose between the two more conventional teams. Should this happen, the Socialists would be wise to stay together and provide a challenge to the new government throughout the year: their effect would be stimulating.

letters

Dear Editors,
We would like to protest the shameless handling which one of the four teams running for AMS Executive has received at the hands of both the Journal and the AMS.

The Associatelessts got their 250 signatures. The Associatelessts put up their 20 dollars. The Associatelessts did everything right. They were then told there was some question as to the legality of their entry.

It is now only a few days until the election. The Court, or whoever was to decide, never bothered informing the candidates of the final decision. In short, they did not know if they were running or not.

A flagrant Misscarriage of justice, you say? Well you're right. Here we have a poor honest hardworking bunch of fellows who have volunteered their time and efforts and they are being tucked away in a corner like Little Jack Horner. Except that they don't even get a plum pie to mess around with.

Well, to make a long story even longer, the team was finally told that it couldn't run because the names it used were pseudonyms. What rot! What actually is the case is that these people don't exist, and because they don't exist, they need your help.

Start a write-in campaign for these much maligned individuals. Show your spirit and vote for a bunch of tall, handsome turkeys. On Election day, Vote Associatelessts.

Bye for now,

Avis team triumphs

Jamie Avis

Paul Steep

Kathy Wood

Dan McClelland
Jamie Avis, Paul Steep and Kathy Wood captured the three top AMS positions early this morning by a victory of 188 votes over the team of Cindy Hall, Bob Butterill and Ross Brown. The ten-member Socialist Slate finished in third place. The Avis team secured 1669 votes, the Hall team 1481 votes and the Socialist Slate 753 votes.

Referring to the 40 percent turnout at the polls, Jamie Avis commended the students at Queen's for a "fantastic turnout" and asserted that "this gives us a real mandate".

Kathy Wood, who will fill the position of Vice president, (University Affairs) in 1976-77, agreed with Avis' point, saying that she was "very impressed with the record turnout".

As part of their campaign Avis, Steep and Wood stressed the need to oppose inadequate funding of universities by the provincial government, the need for a student-tenant association to combat unfair landlord practices and high rents and the need for increased input into university decisions concerning tenure, course evaluation and professors' teaching ability.

Rawlyk: Armageddon is near

Bartlett
"When peoples' dreams collapse they do change things. I see the spectre of Armageddon around the corner. I am amazed at the disorientation in this land. I am extremely pessimistic as I look at Canada and the Western World."

These are statements from the third lecture in the series, "Future of Man". The speaker on Tuesday was Dr. G.A. Rawlyk, recently named head of the History Department here at Queen's and his topic was "The Future of Man from an Historical Point of View."

The "historian has a great difficulty explaining past events;" they are not "outstanding prophets." "I've been concerned about people responding to crisis," Rawlyk began, and "I see their values disintegrating ...and collective disorientation". Introducing himself as a pessimist, Calvinist and a Democratic Socialist he claimed that, "Democratic Socialists, as a rule, welcome the breakdown of capitalism as a step towards the socialist utopia." Rawlyk disagrees because, "historical evidence points toward a form of corporatism or a form of neo-fascism."

"Pierre Trudeau is thinking very much of the corporate idealists of the '20's,' when big business and government were going to get together to solve all the problems. Rawlyk stresses that if "Liberal Capitalism collapses, some force will be applied from either the extreme right or the extreme left to crush individuality." The two great fears of Canadians are "isolation and alienation. Order is far more important than individual liberty...in the Canadian context." For an example he cited the imposition of the War Measures Act in 1970 when "92 or 93 percent of the people supported the government in their action."

"In the Socialist nations the distinctions between productivity and creativity will disappear and production will be seen as creativity and as secular salvation." In the light of the present state of the world, Rawlyk claims that these expectations "ring hollow." "More and more" of our resources, labour and wealth "is being used to create an endless supply of marketable consumer goods, an action "more suited to pigs than men."

"Who's to blame?" Some say the corporate elite, but it is the "ordinary people who genuinely desire to possess things. Our desire to possess must be brought under control"

"As I look at the 60's and 70's I see a small corporate elite with a stranglehold" on Canada's cultural, social, political, and economic life. Rawlyk feels that the free enterprise system has allowed this small corporate elite to control things while the majority of Canadians have had "the freedom to be uneducated, unemployed and the freedom to be poor." They have accepted "the basic thesis of the consumer society--to buy more and more, of less and less." Liberal individualism has become a kind of secular religion."

Rawlyk claims that there is little acceptance of a pessimist Canadian society: "Those who criticize seem to have no faith -- you never challenge authority. We have painted ourselves into a corner and will remain there."

Lewis, White here tonight

Stephen Lewis and John White will speak this evening in the Dunning Auditorium, on "Humanizing Government Policy."

Lewis is the leader of the Ontario New Democratic Party. Born in Ottawa in 1937, he was educated at U of T and UBC. First elected from the riding of Scarborough West (Toronto) in 1963 he has served in the Legislature ever since. Elected leader of the NDP, he has been the official Opposition Leader since the 1975 election.

White, a former Cabinet minister for the Ontario government, was born in Chicago in 1925. He was educated at the University of Western Ontario. White was first elected in 1959 from London South riding and was Party Whip, 1964-67. He has served at various times as Minister of Revenue, Colleges and Universities, Trade and Development, Tourism and Information and Provincial Treasurer. In 1975 he was Chairman of the Cabinet, the year in which he retired.

French community flourishes in Vic Hall

Cynthia David

There is an experiment in progress on the third floor of Victoria Hall. It involves 55 first and second-year students, and if you listen carefully you will probably hear them speaking French, which is what they are there to learn.

The idea of establishing a French community on campus originated in the 1940's when MacDonnell House, on the site of the present Adelaide Hall became a French residence under the direction of Dr. Margaret Gibb. Since 1950, however, when McDonnell House was demolished, there have been no facilities on campus where students could live in a French environment.

The most recent experiment began in April 1974, with the submission of the Ibbotson Report to the Residence Board, where the idea of French Floors was approved in principle. A questionnaire was then circulated among women in residence to determine student interest in the project.

Opposition came from the Women's Residence Council (WRC) which opposed the project for financial reasons, as the original plan included the hiring of extra dons and a coordinator. These additional costs were to be shared by all residents for the benefit of 55. The idea appeared too structured and too costly to succeed; therefore, it was decided to begin the program on a smaller, more casual basis. A modified plan was finally approved, and the responsibility for its organization was left with the Dean of Women's office project aims

The aim of the French Floor program is two-fold. 1. To encourage Anglophones with an academic background in French to beeome orally proficient, 2. To encourage those with a background in French to maintain and use it, and generally, to make students more sensitive to French culture.

According to Mrs. Evelyn Reid, Dean of Women, "The project has been an enormous success. The students are learning French through fun activities which provide a pleasant contrast to their academic studies." There are already plans to expand next year's project to 66 students, and to develop a liaison with the well-established Francophone population in Kingston.

A visit to the floors is an exciting experience. The weekly group meetings allow the girls to get together and discuss current activities and events, in French. Floor 3B is led by the quiet and eapable Margo Murchison, a fourth-year French student. She believes that although the dons and proctors can encourage the girls to speak French, the success of the experiment depends on personal initiative. This is where the environment helps, for it gives the students a common bond and increases their self-confidence. When the vocabulary becomes too difficult there is always a bilingual person nearby such as proctor, Janine Lepage, who will gladly offer assistance. Such problems are inevitable, since the girls are at different levels of comprehension. But, with a determined effort, anything is possible.

As I was warned, the floors vary in character as do the personalities of their dons, who are responsible for the organization of their program. However, I was unprepared for the unusual reception I received on Floor 3E. The vivacious don, Madeleine L'Italien, originally from Quebec City and also a fourth-year French student, appeared wearing a sign proclaiming, "La Belle Fille." This was just the beginning of a parade of girls each wearing signs identifying various articles of clothing with their French names. Slippers, robes, buttons - everything was covered with labels.

The problem of encouraging the girls to communicate in French does not seem to exist here. They must comply, or face the grim prospect of having their names placed on a weekly Black List by a member of the infamous "F.F.", (the French branch of the secret service). Wearing black and white armbands, the members of this select group are responsible for making sure that everyone on the floor always speaks French. Chances of escaping their detection are slight!

Madeleine's goal is to make each floor meeting a special event, whether it be the learning of a new song, or the celebration of a birthday party in French. Through the use of different approaches, she hopes to find the most effective means of communication which will captivate the students' interest at all times.

comfortable

A comfortable group feeling is especially notieeable on this floor, although the atmosphere is relaxed on both. The girls laugh together, and joke about their French experlences. The double rooms on 3E enable the students to establish closer ties with one another. One girl optimistically reported that her French has improved "150 percent" since September.

When asked what they expected from the experimental project, most girls were uncertain, while others were worried that the floor would house only bilingual students, which is not the case. All the girls are thrilled with the results, and many would return next year, except that the prospect of sharing rooms is not very appealing to upper-year-students.

The activities and accomplishments of the French floors indicate the work that has gone into the program, and the enthusiasm it has generated. They also provide a lesson in how to enjoy oneself while learning a new language. Various soirees with French cadets from R.M.C. have been arranged. The residence Christmas party was complete with a French Santa, and last term the girls were treated to a fondue dinner by Professor Ibbotson of the French Department.

The two most impressive accomplishments of the project so far have been the establishment of a French Library in the Upper Common Room of Victoria Hall, which is staffed entirely by volunteers from both floors, and La Galerie Victoria, which features French-Canadian musicians on several Sunday evenings during the term. Both are for the benefit of all Queen's students, not just for those residing on the French Floors.

future plans

With the first year almost over, plans for another are already underway. Possible plans include excursions to Quebec for the Carnaval, and other events. Perhaps someday there will be a brother French floor. The possibilities are endless. It depends, as Mc. L'Italien states, on how much time the organizers and girls are willing to devote to the program.

Credit for this achievement must go to the Dean Reid, who never lost hope despite the controversy and pessimism surrounding the project, to the proctors and dons of the floors, whose combined resources have created a great program, and of course, to the 55 fun-loving residents of 3B and 3E, who made the project come alive

Parrott to reply

Dr. Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, will be visiting the Campus, Tuesday, February 10, 1976. He has invited all members of the Queen's University community to attend a "bear pit" session at 4:30 p.m. in Ellis auditorium at which he will attempt to answer all questions put to him by members of the audience. A large attendance of students and faculty members is hoped for.

Theology elections

The following are the results of the elections for the Queen's Theological Society Executive, held on January 29, 1976.

President: Waldo Gundrum
Program Co-Ordinator (and Vice-President): Louis Pellissier
Secretary: Peter Hartgerink
Treasurer: Paul Currie
AMS Rep: Gordon Taylor

Rehabs hold bake sale to buy library books

Karen Becksted

Students of Rehabilitation Therapy are taking more of the financial concerns facing us all into their own hands, according to Brenda Griffiths, enrolled in her fourth year of Occupational Therapy. The School of Rehabilitation Therapy is plagued by difficulties in locating resource material and students are sponsoring a bake sale today in the hope of raising money to improve their situation.

The problem stems from the fact that the School of Rehabilitation Therapy is small and library resources important to their courses are limited. Some books, owned by professors, are located in a building which is the property of Kingston General Hospital, as a result is closed at 5 p.m. In addition, states Ms. Griffiths, this facility is "really a reading room, not a library, it allows students to make use of professors' resources." Materials may not be removed from the building.

Rehabilitation Therapy students are faced with two other difficulties. Books dealing with Rehabilitation Therapy go out of print quickly due to their small demand. Consequently, some books will probably never be in the Health Sciences Library because once the funds become available, the books are no longer being printed. The Health Sciences Library is shared by the Faculty of Medicine, the School of Nursing Science and the School of Rehabilitation Therapy

Professors have tried to alleviate the problem by mimeographing pertinent chapters of certain books for their classes. However, due to increasing financial constraints, this policy is now frowned upon.

The proceeds from the bake sale (in the Polson Room, 12-4 p.m.) will be put toward library materials. Please support this worthy attempt of Rehabilitation students to aid those enrolled in the School in the future.

Camp Outlook: Dance marathon

Marathon jivers rock half way around the clock at Outlook Dance Marathon last weekend.

submitted by Camp Outlook

During the hours of 8 p.m. and 8 a.m. January 30-31, over 350 people showed up to help dance the night away for Camp Outlook. Some came dressed up, ready for some jiving, notably the two waitresses from "Arnold's" who each won gift certificates from Cooke's. A large number of Outlook Campers showed up as well, which indicates the interest the camp has been able to generate in these Kingston youths.

Fallen Angel led off the evening at 9 p.m., followed by Rockin' Roger and the Ramjets, who played some sets for the Jiving Contest. Final judges for the Contest were Principal Watts, Padre Laverty, and Josef and Vlasta Riha, and they declared John Lister and Mary Pearson the grand prize winners. Their decision was a difficult one, as there were many fine dancers in the finalist group. The names of the winners will be engraved onto a large trophy. Principal Watts also presented the top three couples with Kingston sketches from Domus.

After the final judging of the Jiving Contest was over, the Queen's Jazz Ensemble came on for an excellent set, and people continued to rock to their music. Ralph O'Hara, a square dance caller from Belleville, followed them with a change of pace, and got everyone stomping in a set that lasted til 3 a.m. A series of contests and taped music provided entertainment for the rest of the evening, and about 70 people stayed 'til the 8 a.m. closing. A draw from those staying 'til the finish was held and Patsy Bilow, an Outlook Camper, won the digital clock radio donated by Simpson's Sears.

Prizes still remain to be awarded to those bringing in the greatest pledge amounts. The total amount pledged is over $2700 and we would appreciate it if everyone made an effort to turn in the money by the end of February. The Outlook Office is open for pledge collection from 9:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m., Monday to Friday. Camp Outlook extends a warm thank you to all those who helped in the organization and running of the dance, to ArtsSci '79 for their funding, to the Kingston merchants who donated prizes, to the A.M.S. constables who were on duty, to the musicians who generously donated their time, and to all those who attended the dance. Your continuing support is greatly appreciated.

INTERFACE

Jane McCarthy

Interface: Queen's Report is a weekly television show sponsored by the AMS to promote interaction between Queen's and the community of Kingston. It is run by student volunteers, and given air time on Tuesday night from 7-7:30 by Kingston Cable TV Limited.

Susan Clarke, Cam Dow, Jan Johnston, Hugh Hagen, Paul Konyk and Gary Augustynek run the show, which was begun by Paul Bennett, External Affairs Community Liaison. Bennett, who joined the AMS last March because he wished to be involved at Queen's, helped to start the Kingston Community Forum Canada, a symposium held this fall at St. Lawrence College. As a result of an article appearing in September in the Whig Standard concerning community liaison groups, the AMS was asked by Dave Taylor, from cablevision-13, if they would like to do a half-hour community show. Thus the AMS student production was begun in November 1975, with its purpose being to let people of Kingston know about services and events at Queen's. The air time is free, and tapes are erased and reused, so the only expense involved so far has been the making of the graphics used as a background, an expense which was covered by the AMS Community Liaison fund.

In its role as informant, this show covers such topics as TAK, Teleclinic, The Abortion Information and Referral Centre, visiting professors and general news of Queen's. Through this show, Bennett hopes to make the people of Kingston see that Queen's is a positive asset, for "in this age of financial constraint (I hate that term), I think it important to show this positivencss." On the whole, though, he stressed that he does very little for the programme. "I just sort of co-ordinate the show and keep it going. The six people working it are just terrific. I really appreciate the initiative they've taken, and give them 100 percent credit."

These six people who make the show go all came to be involved through a desire to participate at Queen's. Susan Clarke, who has "always loved the media," took a course at Ryerson in radio and television arts last year. She felt, however, that while she was learning techniques, she did not always know what she was talking about when doing a news report, "That's why I'm at Queen's - to get an education." She is now majoring in political studies, since her interests lie in doing political documentary research. In this way, she became involved in Interface, for Paul Bennett, knowing of her previous experience, suggested it to her. She feels that this show is "a fantastic creative outlet," but that "it is just the icing on the cake. The most fun and most interesting time is before the show, when I'm talking to the person to be interviewed. I make a new friend each time."

Susan thinks of the television show as being at the apex of a triangle, with Kingston and Queen's at the bottom two points, thus forming a bridge between them. The only stipulation on topics covered is that they be of interest both to Queen's students and the people of Kingston. For this reason, the Abortion Information Centre, which is open to the public, the Homophile Association and the Women's Centre have been covered; a film made by Queen's students about the Limestone Golden Age Club, was shown; Ian McCleod from Transcendental Meditation was interviewed; and a programme about natural foods was run.

Susan, Hugh Hagen and Cam Dow work together, and Jan Johnston, Paul Konyk and Gary Augustynek also form a trio. The two groups alternate each week, each deciding the topic they wish to cover and researching it. Hugh, who has had no previous experience with the media, went to the AMS and asked if he could do anything, as he too wished to become involved at Queen's. In this way, he came to work on Community Forum,. When that show ended in November, he was asked by the Interface group, who were impressed by him during their first show covering the Forum, if he would like to work with them. Hugh is mainly concerned with the news, events and sports section of the show. Cam is involved with the researching of the news and topics for the show, and with doing port-a-pac interviews such as one covering the Career Planning and Placement Service. Cam, too, is new to television, but his interest in journalism made him respond to an ad placed in the Journal earlier this year by Paul Bennett. According to Susan, "Cam is just terrific when it comes to organization He has great ideas and lots of enthusiasm."

Jan Johnston volunteered to work with the show because of her interest in journalism, a course which Queen's does not offer She felt that this would be a great experience, for, as she pointed out, "how many times do you get to work for T.V.?" She has worked for CFRC for two years, and welcomes the chance to see what goes on behind the scenes at a television studio Jan is pleased that "all of us have now mastered port-a-pac." Jan hopes to go to Carleton in the future to study journalism.

Paul Konyk, a first year student, also wished to become involved at Queen's, and so answered Paul Bennett's ad. He worked previously at a local cablevision station in Oshawa while in high school. He likes doing the show: "It's interesting and it's involvement. I meet a lot of interesting people and learn a lot about Queen's." He finds that he tends to be the local source of information, with people on his floor, and some of his professors, asking about the show and what's happening. Paul has done the news spot and the researching, and would like to try other facets of the show.

Gary Augustynek, the third member of this trio, says "I hadn't been doing anything at Queen's. The ad in the Journal sounded attractive so I applied." He feels that this will give him experience in dealing with, and talking to, the public, an asset for somebody who wishes to get into law.

Where will the show go from here? All members involved wish to see it continued next year. Paul Bennett hopes to see more on-the-spot interviews, covering the AMS elections, federal and provincial elections, political views and other events. The participants are also anxious for feedback about the show to determine the future direction of Interface: Queen's Report.

Camp Outlook now hiring summer staff

submitted by Camp Outlook

Over the past few weeks you may well have been approached to sponsor someone for last Friday's Outlook Dance Marathon. What is this "Camp Outlook" which looks for your support each year?

Outlook is a Queen's student run project for teenagers from Kingston and the surrounding communities. Almost all of our campers are referred by various Kingston social agencies because of the therapeutic benefit they feel underprivileged and delinquent adolescents derive from the programme.

Outlook is definitely not an ordinary summer camp. There are no residential camp facilities and the entire ten day camping period is spent on a strenuous canoe trip; many of them taken in or around Algonquin Park.

The canoe trip itself can provide a difficult to obtain, but as a result rewarding success experience for a camper exposed to a totally foreign environment for the first time. As the trip progresses, campers and staff form a close cooperative relationship as they meet the challenges of the elements, the portages, and the other experiences which make Outlook something they will not soon forget. Many of the problems of today's troubled adolescents stem from a history of failure and an inability to cooperate with others. Outlook attempts to meet these problems through the medium of the canoe trip.

Now entering its seventh summer of operations, the Camp is looking for both male and female students interested in spending a summer with those less fortunate than themselves. Swimming ability is a necessity and canoeing and camping skills a decided asset, but all staff will still go through a comprehensive training programme in first aid, canoeing and camping skills and Outlook philosophy if accepted as counsellors. Experience with, and ability to relate to adolescents will also weigh heavily in your favour.

Outlook offers you a chance to work not only with the kids, but also in the planning and administration of the camp on a year-round basis.

If accepted as a staff member, summer room and board and a small salary are provided. Access to an interest-free Educational Assistance Fund is also available.

We are also looking for volunteer staff members who may only be able to take one or two ten day trips during the summer. Also, any persons living in Kingston, or planning to work here this summer should see us about the possibility of doing weekend trips.

Sound interesting and challenging? Application forms are available from the Outlook office; up the stairs and to your left, inside the University Avenue doors of the Student's Union. Come and see us before reading week!

AMS Elections

Terry Collins

"The elections in the early days took place on the first Friday in December. Only those who attended could vote, and membership fees of twenty-five cents had to be paid beforehand. Open voting was abolished in 1883 and the ballot system substituted.

Party whips dashed recklessly about town rounding up prospective voters. Canvassing was done even at the polls and sometimes in the classrooms, the professors speaking on behalf of one or another of the candidates, but this was considered unethical and was frowned upon."

So read an article in the Queen's Review of 1940. Until 1908 the AMS presidency could not constitutionally be filled by anyone without a Queen's diploma. Even though this change was made at the turn of the century, it was in 1920 that an undergraduate first held the post.

Originally, the AMS president need not even be a resident of Kingston. The founding fathers of the AMS, primarily Alumni in the Kingston district, decided that if the AMS was to fulfill one of its primary objectives, that being to "Preserve the attachment of the Alumni to the University, and their interest in it after immediate connection has ceases", then it would be in the Society's best interest to have a non-resident who could attend the meetings.

"After the results were announced at the end of election day, it was customary for the students to parade through the city streets, usually concluding with a concerted 'rush' or attack of the local theatre... In 1908 the students attempted to 'rush' the Grand Opera House to see "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and were repulsed by the local constabulary. Eggs were thrown about freely and the net result was that six students spent the weekend in the city gaol."

In 1939 the AMS decided to adopt an electoral college system whereby the President and Vice-President would be selected from a field of four senior representatives from Arts, Levana, Medicine and Science. The junior reps from these same faculties would run for the positions of Secretary and Treasurer. The remainder of the AMS executive was composed of the Presidents of Arts, Levana, Medicine, Theology and Science. When marking their ballots for President and V.P., students would be asked to order their choice by preference, first, second and third. Each candidate would receive three points for a first and so on. The high score would take the presidency and the first runner up became Vice-President. The same procedure was used amongst the junior reps in their race.

It was felt that this system worked well as those who became eligible for the presidency were pre-screened, so to speak, by their respective faculties.

It was under this system that the AMS elections were conducted until 1968 when the present method was initiated. At the time it was said, "The objective of passing this amendment is to improve communications between the AMS executive and the members." There were fears in '68 that this move may result in splits along faculty lines and do nothing to solve the communications problem. Nevertheless, the new procedures (which allowed any students to contest the positions of President and Vice president while running as a team) were hoped to "bring democracy to Queen's."

Students have been suggesting alternative ways of electing the executive of the AMS throughout the Society's history. There was an attempt to develop party affiliations with national associations in 1946, but this idea was resoundingly defeated by the students & I. Some of these on campus who remember the "good old days" of campus elections advocate the return of the electoral college as it is felt that this system brought the greatest degree of life into student politics.

Source material for this column was found among the files of the Alumni Association. Our sincere thanks are extended to Mr. Murray Gill and Mr. Herb Hamilton for their generous assistance during the production of this column.

PC Club slams Bonnell

Dear Editors,
Re: One Man's Politics - Jan. 30, 1976.
After thoughtful consideration, it is resolved by the Executive of the Queen's Progressive Conservative Association that the observations and opinions expressed by Doug Bonnell, concerning P.C. Candidate Brian Mulroney, should be refuted as abhorrent in their intent, petty in content and divisive in implication.

It is difficult to regard Mr. Bonnell's opinions as credible when the "grass-roots-populist" Candidate he is presently working for happens to be losing popular support to the candidate he attacks. Mr. Bonnell's interests are far too personal for any reader to accord his subject proper consideration.

He berates Mr. Mulroney and his backers as old-line establishment in outlook and campaign methods. However, of the four Mr. Bonnell names as representatives of the old guard, at least three are young and reform-minded. Allan Eagleson won the Presidency of the Ontario P.C.Party in 1968 on a platform of innovation and rejuvenation. Ontario Attorney-General Roy McMurtry won his first election last September and represents the left side of the Ontario Tories. John Tory, 21 year old President of the Ontario P.C.Y.F., simply is not old enough to be considered establishment.

How can a man born and raised in a small Quebec town, son of an electrician, practising labour law for most of his career and struggling to keep the P.C. Party alive in "Grit"-entrenched Quebec, be considered an establishment candidate?

It would be equally petty to criticise Flora MacDonald as "establishment" or "patrician" because she happens to be supported by Dalton Camp and Eddie Goodman - two fine old Conservatives.

We in the Queen's P.C. Executive are sincerely concerned about the possible hostility and divisiveness that could erupt among Progressive Conservatives in consequence to Mr. Bonnell's style of public comment, especially with only two weeks left until the Leadership Convention begins. We are also skeptical of the wisdom of the Journal's editorial staff in allowing this column to continue. Surely, the Journal does not wish to impeach the integrity of its fine reputation by acting as a harbinger of venom for one man's politics.

Executive,
Queen's P.C. Assoc.

OFS Rally and the '60's

Dear Editor:
The large crowd of students in Convocation Hall and at Queen's Park for the OFS Rally against the Henderson Report represented the last remnants of the student movement of the 1960's. In those days, students would carry placards for any cause, because the jobs were plentiful when they got out, and pogey paid well even if you called yourself a student. But those days are gone and so is the movement. Students are apathetic about everything but the job at the end of the university machine. Beer and sex are the most important concerns of today's student, and who really cares about OFS, free tuition, or rallies in Toronto.

It was good to see the rally just for old times' sake, but they are old fashioned and 'not where its at'. The rally was also mildly disgusting. The government was challenged to respond to the chanting masses, but when the Minister of Colleges and Universities was sent out to do just that, he was met with catcalls, placards, and obscenities. The students didn't even have the grace, after demanding that he speak, to give the Minister a fair hearing, and yet they expect,as a matter of right, fair treatment from the government. If the Minister was to have treated the students as they treated him, he should have left them protesting in the wind.

OFS is supported by a minority of the Queen's campus, and apathetic students are the only reason that the movement is allowed to exist. In the mid-70's when OFS came to Queen's to ask for additional funding, they made a strange tradeoff to gain student support. The tradeoff took place when OFS told students that the pubs would be protected from government closure by OFS, because of the strength of a province-wide student organization, but to obtain this strength-in-unity, students had to accept a basically left-wing social and economic policy from OFS. And for the sake of a beer, who really cared? OFS readily admitted that it didn't expect that free tuition, living stipend, and a vastly improved OSAP program would ever be implemented anyway, therefore students had little to fear from such policies, but much to gain from a strong student movement if it meant that the pub wasn't going to be closed. As it turned out, the government never intended to close the pubs, and Queen's got OFS.

With the right-wing reaction that is sweeping this country, OFS is farther away from its policy implementation than it ever has been, and as the last of the members of the 60's student movement leave university, OFS will probably die as an organization by the late 1970's.

Queen's student politicians have generally perceived OFS as motherhood and apple pie. Students don't care, and are willing to let OFS remain as long as it doesn't interfere with their beer and sex. Which leaves us with compatible situation, the politicians have their OFS, and we have our beer and sex. Besides, as Monty Python says, "sex is more fun than logic".

Soc. DSC needs changing

Dear Editors:
Thursday-last, our Sociology professor terminated (as it were) his lecture seven minutes shy of a full fifty, announcing as he discreetly shuffled out the door (amid thunderous applause from the Jocks - The Jocks do everything thunderously), that in the remaining time, we were to commune with our DSC (for joy). When his exit was complete, and when the noise had subsided, a sweet bashful young thing appeared at the front of the room, identified herself as someone or other, and mumbled something to the effect, "The profs want to know what we think of the course, so I thought we'd have this Li'l discussion...". Would we care to comment - anything at all. God only knows what she or the profs expected us to say in this "li'l conversation", but what happened was a) The Jocks, in unison no less, proclaimed the course to be "The Fucking Shits", and b) a girl in the corner suggested, with voice aquiver, that her tutor was very nice, and that was it, time was up. The bell went off and so did the class.

Apparently this was to be the course evaluation for Soc. 100. One can imagine the colourful scene as the proud DSC delivers the responsible, considered verdict to the prof.

Obviously then, "li'l conversations" are not a very effective way to ascertain subtleties in class opinion, nor do they encourage constructive criticism (or even, dare I say it) praise, which is after all, the objective of any purposeful evaluation. I suggest to Ms. D.S.C. now as I did then, to no avail, - that she examine the questionnaires prepared by by students in other departments, and provide similar ones for us. The course deserves nothing less than a fair trial, and our opinions deserve more than the whimsical hearing they received on January 26.

Brock hosts

Dear Editors:
We, the Brock University Frisbee Team (BUFT), challenge any Ontario University to a frisbee contest consisting of indoor ultimate frisbee, guts frisbee, and-or freestyle frisbee.

For further information, please contact Phil Cheevers, c-o Brock Students' Union

In the event of no response by Feb. 29-76, we will claim the Ontario Intercollegiate Frisbee Championship for Brock University, and all Ontario universities can spin on it!

Open letter

How much will it cost?

Tuition fees up 65 percent says the Henderson Report - up 25 percent says a committee of C.O.U. - frozen for '76-77, and up in '77-78 says the Minister. Who should we believe? How much will it really cost us to get an education?

In the past few years, one of the most heated and confusing debates in this province has centred around university funding, and tuition fees and student support. I think it's time that events were put in perspective so that Queen's students can understand what's happened and what to expect.

Universities in this province are funded on an enrolment-based formula which results in the student paying about 15 percent, the provincial government 34 percent and the federal government about 50 percent. The federal contribution is established in accordance with the Fiscal Arrangements Act of Canada, which is renegotiated every ten years (next in 1977). Provincial government and student contributions are determined on a year-to-year basis by the provincial government.

The message here is that the provincial government holds most of the cards. Money is now tight in Toronto, so money is tight in the universities.

For the past four years, the increase in the Basic Income Unit (governmental and student support) has fallen short of inflation. Ontario now stands 9th as a province in terms of it's per-student spending on universities. Since governments and universities are feeling the pinch the only answer is to raise fees. Many universities are recommending that they be allowed to set their own fees.

The Wright Commission (1972) recommended that fees be increased up to as much as $2500 for some programmes, and that a system of student aid be set up so that the bright students got scholarships, the poor students got bursaries, and everyone else got loans.

OFS (1972-1976) and every other student federation in the country adopted the firm policy that education is a social right. They echoed government platitudes about universal access, but demanded that they be realized by a policy of free tuition and an adequate living allowance.

The Henderson Report (1975), from a government committee inquiring into ways and means of saving provincial dollars, recommended that students pay 65 percent more for tuition and that grants be eliminated from OSAP. The Report also recommended that similar cuts be made in health care, social services and other sectors.

January 21, 1976 saw 2500 students from all across the province meet in Toronto to discuss the Report and march to protest its recommendations. We were told that its recommendations were being considered by individual ministries, and that fees would be frozen for '76-77 only.

In February 1976, a sub-committee of the Council of Ontario Universities recommends that fees be increased by 25 percent and that OSAP become all-loan, repayment to be contingent upon future earnings. This section of the Report has been rejected by the Council, and has been sent back to the Committee.

The bald facts are that money is tight in Toronto and Ottawa; cuts are being made in every sector. Neither government had given any indication that they are overly concerned with the overall cost of education to the student, or with universal accessibility. Universities, when forced to choose between tight budgeting with the present tuition fees, and a more comfortable budget will choose the latter. The only losers in the game are the students....and the society.

I hope students will keep these aspects of the ongoing debate of the cost of a university education in mind. They relate very closely to developments in other sectors - the trend seems to be to transfer the public debt into private pockets. Please take an interest in the debate.

On a bright sunnyblue day birds twittering in the leafy green sycamores and golden-haired children frolicking on the ample lawns...
On such a warm friendly
summer day,

If GOD came down from the fluffywhite clouds to your neighbourhood...
knocked on your door...

Well, now tell me what would he be like would he dress in a tailored checksuit with wide lapels
sporting a natty tie
& a tastefully coloured shirt or would he wear jeans
a tee shirt & sandals with long long golden red hair & a neatly trimmed equally red beard.
how would he greet you
would he say
How d'ye do would he shake hands with you or maybe rub noses

maybe he'd ask how the kids were doing in school or do you think he would ask after the wife
,was she still having a hard time with the psoriasis

what would he talk about chat about the fine weather weve been having such a shame to have to work on a day like today
when you could pack the wife
& kids into the car
& drive down to the lake swim
do a little fishing
I hear theyre biting up at Lake Engels
in passing would he mention what the Card's chances were in the pennant

would you offer him a beer
& if you were a player short could you persuade him to join in for a friendly game of bridge

do you imagine he'd carry a briefcase pass out glossy pamphlets with bright color shots
ask for donations
(even though you'd given at the office)

would he smile sweetly & forgive you for yelling at him
'cause you thought those kids were fooling around with the door bell again
& do you think he would mind if you werent dressed in Sunday best & if you were just a little hot under the collar 'cause Billy wont remember to take his shoes off when he comes inside and what if it'd been a bad day at the office those people down at processing just arent pulling their weight

I know its pretty damn frustrating down there and the heat!

Christ its been hot these last few days goddammed air - conditioning broke down again hell
& after a hard days work a guys entitled to a beer or two

I mean
you might be a little out of sorts especially since theyd forecast rain on the weekend
& the lousy plumbers strike in its third week

I mean
what if I went on strike
every bloody week?
what then?

oh yeah! I forgot
do you think you'd let HIM in?
or would you say you just didnt have the time today?

bitter grounds

Unique sounds at Bitter Grounds

J.P. Ringwort, a Toronto-based quartet are performing at Bitter Grounds Coffee House tonight and tomorrow night. Their instrumentation is that of the old-time stringbands of three and four decades ago. The musicians are Bill Garrett on guitar, Paul Hornbeck on banjo, Bernie Jaffe on fiddle, and Pineapple Frank Barth on mandolin and dobro. All have long been involved in the Toronto folk-music scene–Hornbeck as manager of the Toronto Folklore Centre, and frequent performer at the Mariposa Folk Festival; Garrett as a guitar instructor at the Folklore Centre; Barth as a studio musician for such artists as Stringband and The Original Sloth Band; and Jaffe has played fiddle for many, including the Dixie Flyers when they played at Bitter Grounds. This summer they played at the Winnipeg and Mariposa Festivals.

Their music falls under the term "old-timey" and can best be described as a mixture of '20's to '40's popular music, ragtime, jigs, reels, and a trace of bluegrass--essentially the music of an old-fashioned stringband. They also bring some humour to the stage as should be evident from their full name. J.P. Ringwort and the Heartbreak of Psoriasis. They are serious musicians, though, and, if this summer's appearances at Mariposa are any indication, promise a very enjoyable weekend.

They will conduct a workshop between 4.00 and 5.00 in Clark Hall on Saturday afternoon to explain and perform some of the roots of their music and discuss 'stringband music'. This workshop is free to members. Non-members must pay 75 cents, but will also receive a Bitter Grounds membership.

The weather report

Paul Shilton

Within increasingly wider intervals of time, I am fortunate enough to discover an album with which I am completely satisfied. "Tale Spinner, a new release by Weather Report, is one of the most exciting albums I have heard yet and has proven the end of another long interval

Joe Zawinul and Wayne Shorter remain the core of Weather Report and recent personel changes have served to improve the band. Weather Report, to date, consists of Zawinul, keyboards; Shorter, soprano and tenor saxaphone; Alphonso Johnson, electric bass; Alyrio Lima, percussion; and Ngudu (Leo Chancler), drums.

All compositions of the album are written by either Zawinual or Shorter. There is some discrepancy between the order of the pieces on the album cover and those on the record itself, but this is a slight inconvenience.

Man in the Green Shirt is a powerful opener by Zawinul. Despite the incredible rythmic and melodic complexities, this piece never loses the quiet hopefulness characteristic of a Zawinul composition. Lusitanos by Shorter, shows his individuality both as a composer and as a soloist Shorter's melodies are more disturbing than Zawinul's but still maintain an impressive beauty. His solo's, as do those of Zawinul, show the influence and maturity of their association with that master of subtlty, Miles Davis. The acoustic piano solo on Lusitanos must be mentioned. It could have been done no other way.

Weather Report has always been very conscious of rythm and Between the Thighs by Zawinul displays the versatility of Johnson on bass and Ngudu on drums. Ngudu is not a high energy drummer such as Billy Cobham or Jenny White, but remains unique in that his first concern is the music.

The album is consistent throughout and the final piece by Zawinul Five Short Stories, features only Zawinul on various keyboards and Shorter on tenor saxaphone. The haunting Debussy-like melodies in this piece harken back to Zawinul's In a Silent Way.

Overall, the album bears the obvious influence of the now-saturated funk revolution, but it never sacrifieces any of the originality or musical values that Weather Report have established.

Renaissance musical feast

There will be a spectacular introduction to the music of the Renaissance on Saturday 7 February at 8:30 p.m. in St. George's Cathedral when the Hortulani Musicae will be presented in concert.

Hortulani Musicae ("The Gardeners of Music") is devoted to the authentic performance of music from the Renaissance and Middle Ages. With the widespread resurgence of interest in this music, the Hortulani Musicae have become Canada's most successful early music ensemble.

The programme presents music from the court of Henry VIII of England and the Medici Court of Italy. King Henry VIII himself was a composer and a number of his pieces will be performed. Among the more famous composers of the Medici Court are Heinrich Issac and Josquin des Pres.

Hortulani Musicae perform the music of the Renaissance on instruments that are authentic reproductions of instruments of the period. The lute, viola da gamba rebecs, recorders and keyboard instruments will be played. The programme will bring Renaissance music to Kingstonians as Renaissance people heard it.

Hortulani Musicae was formed in 1969 and consists of 5 of Western Canada's best musicians.

Ingrid Suderman, soprano, has been a prize winner in the CBC Talent Festival and the Metropolitan Opera Auditions in New York

Ray Nurse, the leader of the ensemble is an internationally known maker of lutes.

John Sawyer is an authority on early bowed instruments and teaches at the University of British Columbia.

Jon Washburn is a noted choral conductor of the Vancouver Chamber Choir, an ensemble that performed in Kingston this Fall.

Patrick Widd is a keyboard specialist who performs early music and contemporary music. He is engaged in a three year project to perform the complete keyboard music of J.S. Bach.

The Hortulani Musicae is Ensemble in Residence with the Vancouver Society for Early Music for the 1975-75 season

This programme is presented by the Performing Arts Office of Queen's University. Tickets at $3.50, $2.50 students and senior citizens will be available at the door of St. George's Cathedral.

Festival cast change

Keith Baxter will appear at the Stratford Festival this summer as Antony in Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra and as Vershinin in Chekhov's Three Sisters, Artistic Director Robin Phillips announced today.

John Colicos, originally announced for the role of Antony, opposite Maggie Smith's Cleopatra, will not participate in the Festival this year. Mr. Colicos withdrew from the Stratford commitment when it became apparent that rehearsals would conflict with the shooting schedule of a film in which he recently accepted a major part. Initially, it was hoped that the two schedules could be arranged so that the actor could complete the film before starting rehearsals for the Shakespeare production. The starting date of the film was changed, however, and Mr. Colicos was unable to establish a firm date for starting rehearsals at Stratford. The Festival was prepared to revise rehearsal schedules to accommodate the actor, moving his starting date back to the end of March, and thereby making available three extra weeks of filming time. Mr. Colicos was unable to commit himself to the new starting date despite the extension and, to avoid jeopardizing the Season, it was necessary to search out another Antony from among the ranks of leading actors available for the necessary time period

Mr. Baxter's theatrical credentials include such acclaimed productions as Sleuth, in which he created the role of Milo Tindle for both the West End and New York productions; Prince Hal in Orson Welles' production of Henry VI and in the film version, Chimes At Midnight.

New tv Drama Writing contest

CBC-TV's Drama Department has announced the Second TV Drama Writing Contest For Students.

The search is for one-hour scripts for videotape production, not for film scripts. Contestants must be Canadian citizens or landed immigrants registered at a Canadian University or community-technical college during the 1975-76 school year. Scripts entered in the contest must be clearly typed and must be postmarked no later than June 30, 1976. All scripts will be acknowledged, but critical comment will not be offered.

First prize is $1,000; second prize is $750; third prize is $500. This payment will be considered to give the CBC a twelve-month option on the Canadian television rights to the winning scripts. Should the CBC decide to purchase and produce any of these scripts, the purchase will be made under the terms of the CBC-ACTRA agreement.

All manuscripts and requests for further information should be addressed to: College Writing Contest, CBC-TV Drama Dept., Box 500, Stn. "A", Toronto, Ontario. M5W 1E6.

Injury forces Baryshnikov to cancel Toronto season:

The National Ballet of Canada was notified today by Hurok Concerts Inc., in New York that Mikhail Baryshnikov, the company's guest artist for its forthcoming Toronto season, has suffered an ankle injury and will be unable to perform with the company as planned. Baryshnikov, who is under Hurok management, was to have danced 11 of the 29 performances scheduled for the 4 week O'Keefe Centre season, February 7 to March 6.

Mr. Gerry Eldred, General Manager of the National Ballet, quoted the wire received from Hurok Concerts: "Regret Mischa Baryshnikov must cancel February engagement with National Ballet of Canada on inedical advice for complete and immediate rest of ankle in warm climate to preclude possibility of serious injury."

The National Ballet of Canada is currently investigating possibilities of other guest artists and alternate arrangements for the season. Mr. Eldred stated that alternative plans will be announced as soon as possible. He said that ticket refunds for Baryshnikov performances will be honoured beginning Thursday, February 5. All refunds will be made by the O'Keefe Centre box office for the face value of the ticket or prepaid ticket voucher received at the O'Keefe Centre up to 48 hours in advance of the performances.

Queen's Drama Dept presents

Esker Mike and his wife Agiluk

Herschel Hardin's Esker Mike And His Wife Agiluk might be called a play about the conflict between the Eskimo and white cultures. That would not be untrue, but in the theatre, it is that and much, much more.

Subtitled Scenes From Life In The Mackenzie River Delta the play focuses on a white trapper, Esker Mike, and his Eskimo wife, Agiluk, who live in the remote Arctic settlement of Aklavik. She has decided to have no more children since their small income forces them to send the children to missionary schools in the government town of Inuvik. Her method of birth control is to stop having sex with her husband--a step he naturally opposes.

The main plot sounds simple, but this is not a play about sexism, nor a sociological tract on ethnic conflicts. It is rather deeply about human needs, fears and desires, written in a cool, almost poetic style that reveals but does not exploit the fiercely human powers beneath the surface.

Herschel Hardin is a Canadian writer with impressive credits behind him in Drama and broadcasting. He wrote this play during the Centennial Year, though it was not produced until the Factory Lab Theatre presented it in Toronto in 1971. It has been published in The Drama Review, broadcast by the C.B.C. and enjoyed numerous productions around Canada. Currently, Talonbooks in Vancouver publishes the script.

In the wide and not the narrow sense, this is a Canadian play--though about a part of our national life few of us know directly. It is a work filled with sympathy for all concerned, but also with a sharp eye for the harsh truths we must face--not only in the deep north but throughout the land. The Queen's Drama Department is pleased to continue its long tradition of presenting Canadian plays with Herschel Hardin's Esker Mike And His Wife Agiluk.

The performance runs February 5, 6, 7, 12, 13, 14, at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall. Tickets are $2 on Thursdays, $1 for students, and $3 on Fridays and Saturdays, $2 for students, available at the Drama Desk, 547-6291, and at the door.

The Theatre Building Fund and University support

As the reporter who wrote the article which appeared in the Journal on January 27 concerning the transfer of the Theatre Building Fund, I feel it is time to respond to the comments that have and, more importantly, have not been made concerning this topic.

First, I would like to thank Ian Nordheimer for the compliment he paid me in his letter Friday Jan. 30. It is not often that a reporter for the Journal can expect a friendly word from the President of the AMS. However, I do take objection to the lack of anything constructive he said in his letter. One half of the letter is nothing more than a list of issues that faced the AMS this year, one quarter of it is the compliment to me and the ensuing insult to the Journal staff, while the remaining quarter says that I did raise some interesting questions. All this despite his opening sentence: " I would like to make a few preliminary comments on the issue of the Theatre Building Fund."

In a somewhat lengthy and grammatically incorrect letter, Paul Steep, VP (Operations) says that "the issue will boil down to one point: How are the interest of students best protected?" Although Steep does admist that "The transfer of funds may well have been done without due regard for the proper procedures," he does not feel that the unauthorized transfer of $32,000 raised by students for a University theatre in any way shows that the AMS failed to represent the intersts of the students."

But throughout the entire time since the article was printed the most startling yet revelant voice was the lack of comment from the people most immediately affected. I am referring to the Fine Arts students and the Heads of the Departments involved: namely Drama, Film and Music, not to mention the Humanities. It is easy to see how such an illegal action passed through without notice. The Journal has yet to recieve one letter from anyone else other than the two people mentioned at the beginning of this one. After this letter has appeared in print no doubt many comments in favour of the Journal's stand will be sent, but their support will be too little too late. While I did not expect the Fine Arts students to take to the streets in protest, letters of support would have been at least a moral boost. All the excuses that will arrive in the mail will not change the fact that in fourteen days not even one letter of indignation from the permanent members of the Committee has been sent.

The matter has now been presented before the AMS, the AMS elect, the University Administration, the Department Heads and the student body. I alone can do no more I alone will do no more.

Your just desserts

Your Mother

Desserts don't always have to be sickeningly sweet and dripping with calories to taste good. In fact, fruits create a nutritious dessert and satisfy a sweet tooth as well, if the right recipe is prepared.

Apples are one of the cheaper fruits available on the market right now. Although the quality of the apples is not the same in winter as in autumn, they still provide a good main ingredient for many dessert recipes. There is a wide variety of preparation possibilities for apples, so that they may be served many times during the winter and you will never tire of them. Mix up a fruit salad of apples, bananas, oranges, grapes and grapefruit. Add some sugar or let the fruit juices create their own syrup.

Most of the recipes which use apples are simple to make and the most time required for preparation is taken up by peeling and slicing. If you buy a bag of apples on special and you are not able to use them all immediately, peel, slice, and freeze them. Then, when you only have a short time to spend on preparing dessert, the apples will be ready to just be added to the other ingredients.

Apple-Nut Cake (preparation time - 1 hour, serves 4)
1 egg
¾ cup sugar
½ cup flour
2 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
½ cup peeled, diced apple (1 medium)
½ cup chopped walnuts
1 tsp. vanilla

Combine egg, sugar, flour, baking powder and salt in large bowl. Mix apples and nuts. Add to egg mixture. Mix well. Blend in vanilla. Bake in a greased heat-resistent glass dish. (A casserole dish is good for this.) Bake at 325 degrees for 30 to 40 minutes. This may also be served with whipped or ice cream.

Apple Crisp (preparation time - 1 hour, serves 6)
4 cups sliced apples
1-3 to ½ cup sugar
3 to 4 tbsp. water,
2 tsp. lemon juice or a dash of cinnamon
Two thirds cup flour
½ cup light brown sugar pinch of salt
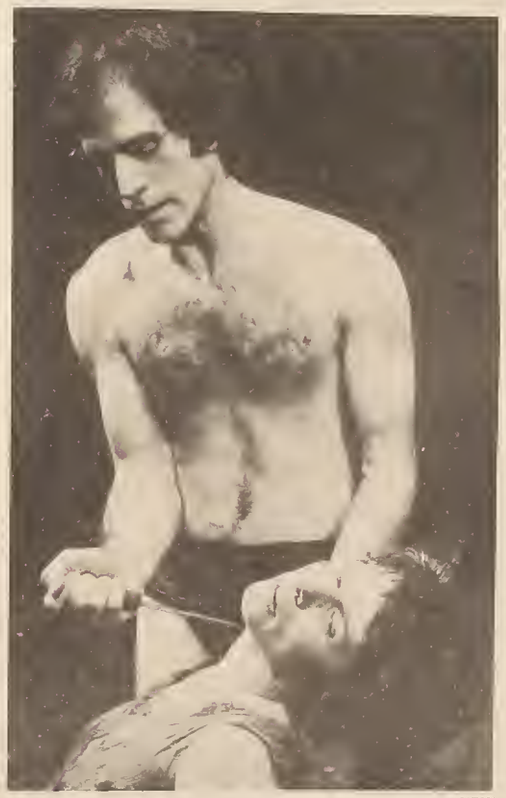
Two thirds cup rolled oats
6 tbsp. soft margarine



(Differences in quantities for sugar and water provide a difference in taste and consistency. The choice between lemon juice and cinnamon also allows for preferences in the taste of the Apple Crisp.)

Combine apples, sugar, water and lemon juice or cinnamon. Spread in a greased 8" baking pan

Combine flour, brown sugar, salt and rolled oats. Mix in margarine well and spread mixture over apples. Bake at 350 degrees for 40 minutes, until apples are tender and top is browned.

Electra was here

Last Wednesday night Kingston was treated to an unusual experience at McArthur Auditorium. This happening was the Montgomery-Chaiken production of Electra. The performance was short, only forty-seven minutes in length, and when the house lights went up, the reaction of the members of the audience varied greatly.

Some people thought it was the most fascinating thing they had ever seen on stage. Others felt that they had been badly ripped off.

The production was, as one person called it, "experimental", and my remarks concerning it should not be construed to reflect on all experimental theatre, since I fall in the latter group mentioned above.

The director attempted to unite words, sounds, movements, symbols, and character to create a total experience for the audience He then tried to balance that with the Aristotilian ideas of theatre. The resulting mixture was an incredible sight to behold. Actors, slow, stiff and silent, standing somewhat pigeon-toed and knocked kneed, attempting to portray characters of great bearing and dignity destined to commit murder or to be murdered. Movements, at first impressive, repeated to the point of redundancy and boredom. Sounds, rasping and harsh, overdone 'till you wonder how they can speak any more.

The major reason the attempt failed was because the actors had by now been on the road for some time, and innovations once quite alived and exciting had now grown stale. The result, an originally interesting idea grown old due to over use.

Montgomery's text is an impressive adaptation and deserves better use.

Heroic effort, but doomed from start

Larry Nightingale

To be fair to the potential audience of a musical such as Brigadoon the reviewer must, to some extent, suspend his critical judgment and concentrate on the entertainment value of the material and performance. To be a success the musical must contain a lively balance between the disparate elements of plot, song, dance, and acting. The Brigadoon plot is so vacant and unbelievable that it's not till almost the end of the first act that one can even figure out exactly what the plot is. The characters are two-dimensional and the story line almost non-existant.

Director David Fanstone had a gargantuan task in finding something meaningful for the characters to do. Luckily, the cynically flippant role of Jeff Douglas (performed by George Pothitos) gave Fanstone a toll to the entire cast of mamby-pamby characters and ridiculous plot. Douglas becomes by default the central character; his flippant sarcasm gives the audience the opportunity to laugh with rather than at the production.

Two Americans, Tommy Albright (Robert Hanks) and the aforementioned Jeff Douglas while on holiday (?) in Scotland, stumble upon a tiny village, Brigadoon, which has entered some weird science fiction time-warp. The village inhabitatnts move through one day in time as the rest of the world moves through one hundred years. Thus, two 'days' after this spell has been cast our two modern New Yorkers find themselves with people still living in the apparently peaceful, pastoral eighteenth century. Explaining the subplots and interactions of these folk would be futile. Suffice it to say that Albright, who believes in love and justice, gets his miraculous reward, tripping off to the constellations with his wee bonnie Fiona, while good old Jeff Douglas is left clutching his pint of bourbon.

Frederick Loewes's music, though never particularly inspiring, is given a fine reading by the orchestra, under the direction of fourth year Bachelor of Music student John Palmer The most awesome tasks were those of the chorcographer (Jill Hodkinson) and the choral director (Judith Bourne). Hodkinson, had to move a huge cast around a spider-like, precariously balanced set. The dancers would usually stay in one place dancing around in circles, which is what the highland fling is basically about anyway When coordinated, they were graceful and pleasing. When out of step (often, unfortunately), the dancers created a discordant and jumbled effect. The overall level of singing was the weakest in years. The inclusion of just one good soloist would have helped enormously, but none of the performances came even close to that of Sharon Keates in Bye Bye Birdie two years ago.

We must give credit where due. Julie Salverson, as the promiscuous half-gypsy Meg Brockie, was delightful, as was Glen Piper playing the jilted Harry Beaton. Piper must be commended for creating a character that was something more than a cartoon, and especially for his graceful sword dance during the wedding scene.

Sometimes diplomacy, not honesty, is the best policy. There's no point whatsoever in slashing through wooden acting and flat singing that may be there. Not when we consider that these dozens of people spent months preparing Brigadoon for the enjoyment of any who might wish to attend. One can wonder, however, why discerning, creative people would select such a vacuous, mindless property to work with.

Possible Beatle comeback?

From the Cord Weekly

On an early Beatle album, John Lennon sings, "Oh give me money, that's what I want". On July 5, 1976, barring any legal difficulties, Lennon, along with the rest of the Fab Four, will make those lines a reality. Bill Sargent, a Hollywood promoter, has agreed to pay the foursome $30 million dollars for a twenty minute concert (minimum time) plus 50 percent of the total gate receipts. The tickets will probably sell for $50.00. The reunion will be shown on closed circuit T.V. via large movie screens throughout the world and Sargent has guaranteed that the picture will be remarkably clear and feature a six track sound system. Sargent feels that his scheme will attract at least 3,000,000 customers and that the Beatles final portion of the pie could be in excess of $75,000,000. $200,000,000 an hour isn't bad money and would put them in the same income bracket as mechanics and dentists.

Sargent's plot to reconstruct the music industry's most successful and perhaps talented group will definitely have complications. First of all, what are the chances of bringing the four together for the first time since 1971? Secondly, will people pay $50.00 to see a concert on a movie screen? And finally, will the Beatle's of '76 be able to generate the charisma of the Beatle's of '65 or perform the remarkable music which made albums such as Sgt. Pepper and Abbey Road musical legends? These are questions which must be considered before people recall their Beatle T-shirts and John Lennon hats from the attic.

The main problem is convincing each one of the Beatles to agree to such an event. Unless they have plunged into the realms of senility, the money involved will probably convince them into giving up an hour of their time. However, they have been offered large sums of money in recent years but the rumours of a Beatle reunion never materialized. One deciding factor has been the fact that each member's musical tastes have become quite diversified, although flashes of the old Beatles are evident on their solo efforts.

I doubt very much if there would be problems selling the tickets for $50.00 when one considers the high prices people pay scalpers to see musicians who couldn't read the music in a Beatle's songbook. Also, many people would probably pay a high price of admission just to tell their friends that, "I saw the Beatle's last performance". To add to this, the movie screen method is the only conceivable way one would have a chance to see the Beatles again since the possibilities of a tour seem rather remote: How could the legends from Liverpool compete with their nemesis, the Bay City Rollers, who are being billed as the new Beatles.

Different people argue that it would be impossible for the Beatles to resume their musical excellence of past years. This is true to some extent. Although each member has made at least one good solo album (excluding Ringo), it is quite obvious that they have failed to musically progress as separate entities when compared to their efforts as a single unit. McCartney has continued to play basic rock music but Lennon and Harrison have gone off on different musical tangents. It can be reasonably assumed, however, that a Beatle reunion would result in some superb music, whether it be old songs or new material.

The possibilities of Sargent's dream concert seem rather speculative at this time, but he believes that a person would be crazy to turn down such an astronomical sum of money, since there have been rumours that the Beatles are broke (ha, ha). The odds would appear to be in Sargent's favour since this would be a grand exit for the Beatle's illustrious career.

If anyone deserves this kind of money for a comeback, it's surely the Beatles. They have never disappointed their fans with mediocre material and they have missed out on what could have been many very prosperous contracts since their split.

One must now wait until July. Neil Sedaka, eat your heart out.

Architects and the Royal Academy of Arts, London, 1769-1785

Jim Rogers

Architects and the Royal Academy of Arts, London, 1769-1785 is not usually considered as an exhibition title that would impel one to visit the Arts Centre. However, anyone in general and those with an interest in eighteenth century architecture, drawing or thought in particular, will find this current exhibition in the Print Room at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre to be quite stimulating.

Organized by students of the British Architectural History, 1600-1836 course and displaying drawings selected by Prof. P DuPrey, the show traces the path that saw the favoured building style of the time, Neo-Palladianism, become absorbed by and instituted into a style we now refer to as Neo Classicism. The drawings in the exhibition range from a quick and rather tentative Sir John Soane sketch of a palace to a magnificent perspective view of a Thomas Sandby bridge envisioned to stretch over the mighty Thames. The drawings on view have been loaned by the Victoria and Albert Museum, the Royal Institute of British Architects and the Royal Academy of Arts, all located in London, England. In many cases, this is the first time that a number of the drawings have been shown outside of Britain and this in itself is reason enough for viewing the show. Seldom are works such as those now on display made so available to the general public.

In order to give one the feeling of attending a Royal Academy exhibition in the late 1700's, the students have hung the drawings and related material in a manner that would have been acceptable at that time. The walls are covered with a tiered display of work that in conjunction with a display of rare books and pieces of sculpture, similar to what could be found in the Royal Academy at the time, creates an 18th century aire.

The research for each drawing in the exhibition was done by one student and a summary with the significance of that work in relation to the Royal Academy appears beside it. The array of subject matter depicted in the drawings is in itself quite interesting and ranges from a huge pyramid-shaped mausoleum flanked by Egyptian obelisks to a garden seat based on a Greek Temple of years gone by.

Prof. P DuPrey of the Art Department at Queen's will give an illustrated lecture to mark the opening of the exhibition. Entitled, "John Soane and the Royal Academy: A Star is Born", it will be given at 4pm, Sunday, February 8th in the Art Centre and an open invitation is extended to all. If you miss the lecture at least see the exhibition and share in this interesting and novel approach to architecture of the 18th century.

Basketball Gals clip Robins wings

Atwood

On Tuesday, the Basketball Women of Queen's University in Kingston Ontario, were challenged for 3rd place in the Eastern Division of the OWIAA by the Carleton Robins from Ottawa

The outcome of the game was a decisive 59-34 victory for the Gals. Kathy Keely, the captain of the team lead the scoring with points. Kim Headford potted 13, Pat Quigley the co-captain was good for 12 and Laura Mattson came up with 10.

In this game--all of the Gals saw action on the floor.

The game started out slowly and to the discouragement of spectators and players alike the scoring was even throughout most of the first half.

The Gals were shooting almost 40 percent (which was a pleasant change) and the rebounding statistics were fairly impressive. Headford pulled down 13 while the rest of the team were stronger than usual under the boards.

The Gals really needed this win. They also need to achieve victory in the upcoming weekend games against U of T and York in Toronto.

Results of these games will appear in Tuesday's Journal so stay posted.

Gaels lose to Ravens at bottom of league

Alps Boniwell

Last Tuesday night the Gaels basketball team dropped an 82-72 decision to the Carleton Ravens. Respectable enough, but still a loss. If the Gaels could win either of their two weekend matches at York and Laurentian that would ease the pain, but at present, it looks as though RMC is their best bet. The team plays RMC next Tuesday.

This past Tuesday, the first half ended on a 44-33 score. The Gaels mixed it up on defence where they switched from man to man to zone and alternated full court and half-court zone presses. The presses were generally very effective forcing a number of misplays on Carleton's part. On defence however, it seemed the Gaels were often victims of their own strategy and got as mixed up as anyone. Although Carleton only scored 82 points compared with total in the 90's in Queen's two previous matches, the Ravens seemed to be offensively understaffed and they were probably happy enough to escape with as many points as they did. For Carleton, the higher scorer was John Love with 18 points and 12 rebounds while Paul Armstrong and Don Reid each had 13. For the Gaels Andy Boniwell scored 23, Dave Dempster 13 and Steve Mccredy 10. Remember, next Tuesday the Gaels play RMC right here at Queen's, and would appreciate a good turnout.

Bews News

Paul Findlay

A week ago last Wednesday the Cross-Country ski race was held at West Campus. Because of the changed time only 21 of the 34 entries appeared to race. The winner of the event, a good minute ahead of anyone else, was Morel of Education in a time of 24 min., 53 seconds Anderson of PHE was 2nd in 26:19, nipping Hogervoorst of Mechanical by 4 seconds. Barnes of Arts '77 was 4th in 26:58 and Ostrom of PHE, 5th in 28:10. Only two units fielded a full team. PHE took the title with a total time of 117:13. Commerce '76 was 2nd with 152:51. Thanks to Jake Edwards for running a smooth meet.

Most of the team sports are coming to the end of the regular season, so I will list some of those sports and those teams which are looking for playoff spots, and their records.

In Basketball: Division B: PHE (3-1), Arts '79 (2-0), Bus. Grads (2-1); Division E: Education (4-0), Science '79 (2-1); Division W: Civil-Math, Meds, Comm '79 (all 2-1); Division S: Law '77 (3-0), Mining (2-1). Of course it is still early to rule out some of the teams that I have not mentioned especially those which have played only 1 or 2 games.

In Curling, there are 2 weeks remaining. There is only one undefeated and untied team: Division A: Comm '76 (2-0), Civil-Math, Law '78 (both 2-1); Division B: Law '77, Bus. Grads (both 2-1); Division C: Arts '77, Mining, Comm '78 (all 2-1); Division D: PHE (2-0-1), Arts '76 (1-1-1). It looks like the final one or two games will be important for many of these teams as all the races seem close.

Law and Bus. Grads seem to be dominating the Bowling scene. In the Tuesday section Law '77 has a commanding lead with 29 points (out of a possible 33) Law '76 is 6 points back at 23, PHE has 21 and Bus. Grads are at 18. In the Thursday group Law '76 has 31 out of a possible 39 points. Law '77 is one point back, Bus. Grads have 26 points and Mechanical "A" has 23½. The season is exactly half way over.

In Hockey, Division 1: Meds (who is getting out 17 guys for 6:30 a.m. games) (6-0-2); defending champs Arts '76 (4-1-2); Division 2: Comm '76 (7-1-1), Comm '79 (6-1), Mining (5-3); Division 3: Bus. Grads (who are also getting a full complement for early morning games) (7-1), Arts '78 (7-0-0-1) (that is they are undefeated except for one defaulted game); Division 4: Arts '77 (9-0), Comm '78 (5-3-1), Civil-Math (3-2-3). Jim Henderson the Convenor, rates Meds, Arts '77, Comm '76, Arts '78, Bus. Grads as teams to watch. A big question is whether Arts '76 will be able to revive their winning ways. Jim asks that each team provide a timer for each game. A lot of time is lost if referees have to work the clock and the scoresheets. Games are losing up to 5 - 8 minutes.

In Broomball, in which the top 3 teams in each division make the playoffs: Division 1: Comm '77 (5-0), Law '76 (4-1), Arts '77 and Electrical (2-2). The third playoff position will be decided when those teams meet. Division 2: Comm '76, Mechanical (3-1), Independent (2-0-0-1). Three other teams have 1 win each so every team is still in the running. Division 3: Bus. Grads, Comm '78 (3-0-1), Arts '76 (2-2).

Standings have been changed slightly with the addition of points for Cross-Country Skiing. PHE has taken over 2nd spot. Top ten are:

1.	Comm '76	40782
2.	PHE	38989
3.	Arts '77	38870
4.	Comm '77	32646
5.	Civil-Math	30378
6.	Law '77	30086
7.	Arts '76	29771
8.	Bus. Grads	29168
9.	Mech.	28666
10.	Mining	25712

WIC in action over the weekend. WIC curling is over, but there are lots more activities for the youthful and enthusiastic on campus.

While a few team-mates were turning in some fine performances at the Star Trials last Saturday, the rest of the team was involved in The Worst Organized Meet of the Century. At the 1st Annual (God forbid) Western Open, some of the low spots included: an unannounced hour-early-start; an unannounced change of the 3000 in from 5:00 (M) and 5:15(F) to 12:30(M) and 12:45(F); the running of the 1500 m before the 50 m and 600 m (a surprise schedule change); running two people in each lane in sprint heats; the allowing of a disqualified 300 m runner from Western to "try again" in a later heat; the allowing of the disqualified Western men's relay team to "try again" in a subsequent heat; the recall of the women's 50 m final after one runner had already crossed the finish line; a wonderful butcher job of the men's 50 m hurdle final which had the race run three times because the organizers couldn't manage to set the hurdles up properly. The officiating, if it could be called that, was done by some of the surliest and most incompetent characters around (where did they find them?). Amazingly enough, some Queen's people still managed some decent performances in the midst of this fracas. Anne Brown ran a personal best by 29 seconds in the women's 3000 m thereby setting a new Queen's record of 12:09 (old QR 12:49.6).

Adam Shoemaker ran a personal best of 4:03.1 in the men's 1500 m. Peter Becke placed 1st in the triple jump. Kevin Thompson was 1st in shot put with team-mate John Ongarato in 3rd. Gary Tetzlaff was end in the pole vault. Pam Scothorn took 1st in the women's shot put. Clyde Sheppard grabbed 4th spot in the men's 600 m. A new team-member but no stranger to running, Janet Morris, ran a 43.1 300 m with women's captain Jan Ripe finishing .3 seconds behind.

The consensus of team opinion is that, if this meet is a taste of things to come at the finals, everyone will be sharpening up their spikes in the hope that the meet director will offer himself up as a human starting block.

Hockey Gals sinking

Quince

The Queen's Hockey Gals had a frustrating day when they travelled to McMaster and Guelph on Fri. Jan. 23. They returned with only one out of a possible four points. A scheduling conflict forced Queen's to forfeit their home ice advantage and play in Guelph almost immediately after the McMaster game. This put the Gals at a definite disadvantage and they could only salvage a tie against a team that should have been easily defeated.

The Gals first took to the ice against McMaster in what turned out to be an exciting game of hockey. Lois Cole opened the scoring for MAC at the 5:25 mark and "Yuk" Atkinson tied it up for Queen's before the first period ended. In the second period MAC outscored Queen's 4-2. The Queen's goals were scored by Atkinson (from Leeman and Ferrari) and Sue Wright (unassisted). The third period was wide open as Queen's did everything but put it in the net in an attempt to get back in the game. MAC netted the clincher at 12:55 mark of the 3rd period and ended the scoring at 6-3. This game proved that McMaster is the team the Gals will have to beat at the OWIAA finals.

There was no time to cry over spilled milk as the Gals were scheduled to play in Guelph at 8:00. It was a scrappy game in which the Gals had to play "come-from-behind" hockey most of the time. Guelph outscored Queen's 5-3 in the first period. Bartlett combined with Gerow and Statten to put Queen's on the scorebord at the 10:56 mark. At 9:34 Wood scored from Cook and Cervinka. Ferrari scored an unassisted goal with 28 seconds left in the 1st period. Queen's had a better 2nd period as they tied the score at 6-6 on goals by Quincy Pettey (ass. by Bartlett and Gerow) Yuk Atkinson (ass. by Syme and Ferrari) and Gerow (from Atkinson). Guelph come out with two goals in the 3rd period and again Queen's was forced to come from behind. A goal by Ferrari (from Atkinson and Gerow) and an unassisted goal by Sue Wright set the final score at 8-8.

In many ways it was more frustrating to tie Guelph than it was to lose to McMaster. The Gals have yet to play a good game in Guelph as their incredibly small rink cramps Queen's free-skating style of hockey. If Queen's and Guelph meet again on the championship playoffs the outcome could be very different

The Gals travel to York University and U of Toronto on Feb. 6 and 7 for the final games of their regular season play. They could pick up 4 valuable points if they play the kind of hockey they're capable of.

Young review another cliche

Dear Editor:
The review of Neil Young's new album Zuma faithfully reheated the prevailing critical cliches attached to Young's work, most of which vary from insensitive misrepresentations to the glib prattle which masks its vacuity behind superficial pleasantries. The review's claim that Zuma's guitar work is grounded in "rocking blues" completely lacks foundation in fact. Young flirted with blues chord progressions in On the Beach with mixed results; the cautious structural experimentation behind such songs as "Dangerbird" and "Cortez the Killer" on Zuma, where Young tinkers with verse and chorus arrangement is very distant from the predictable development of the blues. The reviewer was probably misled by the title of the song "Barstool Blues" whose intervals are cribbed from the Stones' song "Rocks Off." In the light of this discreet plagiarism, as well as Young's usurpation of the chord progression of Robin Trower's "Daydream" in his own "Dangerbird," the review's remark that Zuma is a "Very American" work is an ill-considered one.

The charge of certain of Young's songs wallowing in self-pity is also without substance. There was an element of maudlin self-absorption in some of the Buffalo Springfield material ("Expecting to Fly," "Flying on the Ground is Wrong") but Young outgrew the pose of the separated lover's bittersweet tristesse after the excesses of Goldrush's "Oh Lonesome me." Zuma rejects the postures of pathos in its first song "Don't Cry No Tears" and in "Stupid Girl" and "Drive Back" it lashes the folly of those who persist in clinging to them. As for Young's honesty one need only read his lyric sheets to notice the determinedly oblique candour of his personal examinations in Zuma and to appreciate the unnerving immediacy of his confessions in the yet to be equalled "Tonight's the Night." Me, I've always preferred to see Young's imaginative adaptions of aberrant personae (check out "Revolution Blues" and the nihilistic drifter in Tonight's "Albequerque"). The review's favourable reaction to Zuma was undercut by the short-sighted nature of its evaluations and did little to restore any aesthetic credibility to a genre of criticism which is so frequently unreliable.

Kierans' main point missed

Dear Editors:
It is unfortunate that such a distinguished Canadian as Professor Kierans could come to Queen's, give a first rate entertaining and thought provoking talk and be so misrepresented in the press. Nancy Bowes' article was a little incoherent and Rob Beamish's esoteric, or to use a "seminally obfuscated" phrase, high falutin' work missed the message. For the benefit of those who missed this superb talk I would like to clarify what was said.

Kierans' main point was that corporations were too big and were not responsible enough to society. He said that larger corporations have been allowed to swallow up small ones, have taken control of areas in which they have no business (INCO buying DOMTAR for instance) and that this has brought about the corporate oligopoly (the major share of the country's assets owned by a small group of corporations) which has destroyed the free market system. 'The corporations are invincible - it is no longer possible for an individual to enter the system and compete for a share of the market,' he said.

To restore a freer (not free) market economy, Kierans indicated how he felt governments should act. He thinks that government should discourage or perhaps prevent one corporation from taking control of another. He feels that corporations should be restricted to the specific area of business which they start out in (INCO should stick to mining and not get involved with pulp and paper). These measures would not discourage corporate expansion. Rather they would encourage a company to expand its operations within its existing framework and would also curtail the increasing concentration of corporate power.

To make corporations more responsible to the rest of society, Kierans suggested that governments should increase heavily the taxes on those profits which are plowed back into the corporation. This would encourage business to "share the wealth" to benefit the general population from which it derives its wealth.

Contrary to Ron Beamish's critique, Kierans does not argue for an Adam Smith, laissez-faire market system. If anything, Kierans' proposals mean greater government involvement with corporations and more controls on their behavior. Kierans did not argue for the repeal of legislation which enables corporations to exist. He merely wanted the repeal of legislation that would allow a corporation to buy the assets of others - Beamish has obviously missed this point. Of course, the power and modes of production would remain in the hands of the few (the 213,000 corporations) but if Kerans' suggestions for corporate taxation were implemented, the capitalists would pursue the interests of the general public primarily.

To Nancy Bowes, leave your notebook at home; to Rob Beamish, take off your RED earmuffs and listen to the enlightened words of one of our most outstanding, original and honest thinkers.

Crude, ignorant and sober

Dear Editors,
On Friday evening a crude, ingorant and drunk student created a display that warranted the full attention of the law. He got it. However not only was he charged for his uncouth behaviour, he suffered the full obloquy of the Journal. Udoubtedly both these actions were desirable and yet I could not help thinking after reading the article by Atwood that something was missing. That something is, I think, an apology to all those who had the misfortune to cast their eyes on the loathsome creature that created the afore-mentioned disturbance. I am that person, and I hope that the declamatory nature of this article is sufficient proof of the extreme regret I now harbour because of that incident.

Copeland's churchmouse

Four long years ago, I entered this esteemed institution never having seen the campus, talked to a prof, or having heard one of the salesmen that the Registrar sends around the country. I came here, like many of my fellows, to get away from home, to get a "better degree", and to get an education. Neither my parents, nor their parents, had ever set foot in the door of a university, and they still have little idea of what goes on behind the limestone walls. For me, this place was like a god. I thought that the greatest thing in the world would be to get a degree from Queen's, or any university for that matter, and now that I have one, the feeling is gone.

Watching the first-year people brings back memories. They look so excited about this place, about going to class, and going out on the weekend. Always running around in a daze, they finish essays on time, rarely miss class, and few converse with the professor. Within the next short year, they will realize that essays don't need to be handed in on time, that professors are often as lost outside the classroom as they are, and besides, God invented classes to be missed as a way of life.

Neither Queen's nor Toronto, nor even Oxford are golden pots at the end of the rainbow. The freshmen are fortunate that the world hasn't told them that reality yet, because if it did so many of them wouldn't be here. I would have, because getting that degree meant more than anything else in the world, but you don't need to come here to get an education, just a degree. A degree has little symbolism anymore. We've turned out so many of them, their value has dropped in proportion to the number granted. The belief that a college education is the key to a better-paying job, is false. You could be a policeman or a garbageman and make more money than most university grads will start at in their first year of fulltime employment (if they can even get a job).

The belief that this is the place to get an education is false. High school guidance counsellors believe that just as night follows day, university follows high school. Not true, because you can learn in a million other ways and places and be just as competent if not more so than a university grad.

And importantly, university isn't the place to sort out one's life. Let me qualify that by saying, it is essential to your success here at Queen's that you know why you came here, and what you want to get out of this place. But if you came here looking for answers - "Who am I??" and "Where am I going?" you won't find it any easier than if you were in Pugwash or Antigonish.

Queen's reputation, and that of most other universities is too high! This institution was designed to create scholars, but along the line we've started to train people, and in doing that, the university has had to sell itself like any other commodity. It just isn't the case, baby. But who is going to destroy the myth? Not I, said the principal, not I said the Premier, and not I, said the corporations.

"Dirty Rock" in Jock Harty

Dear Editor:
This may seem a trivial matter to complain about, but I am writing regarding the music played at free ice skating time on Campus. I am certain that there exists other music other than 'immoral' rock music. On Friday last Jan. 30-76, the type of music played was of one sort, namely rock, in my opinion 'dirty-rock'. I vividly remember a song that kept repeating the same words "please don't baby". The artist, if the person may be called that, seemed to in a state of sexual euphoria. Would it be too much to ask that the musical taste of those that still have sensitive ears and souls left be respected? If Queen's is so poor that they have to dish out that trash, I will gladly offer to give them some suitable ice-skating music, e.g., how about some big-band music like James Last or Bert Kempfert. How about it? One closing thought, that ice-time isn't really free if I have to suffer under that "Music" in order to enjoy some recreation.

Flora wants students' help

a. Flora MacDonald, MP and candidate for the leadership of the Progressive Party of Canada, spoke to the Journal last week about her campaign.

Dan McClelland and Nancy Bowes

Flora MacDonald, MP for Kingston and the Islands and candidate for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party, has made a plea for support from Queen's students to work for her at the PC Leadership Convention to be held in Ottawa from February 18 - 22. People are needed to staff information centres and work in the hospitality suites in Ottawa.

The need for help was revealed during an interview with the Journal late last week.

A relaxed but nonetheless business-like Flora MacDonald answered questions about the financing of her campaign. Approximately $30,000 has been raised in the usual manner, that is by having individual supporters approach corporations and ask for donations. Another $30,000 has been sent to the "Five to Fifty for Flora Fund." This rather unconventional method of campaign financing required asking friends and supporters across the country to contribute anywhere from $5 to $50 to her campaign fund.

The request that every woman in Canada send MacDonald one dollar has brought an overwhelming response. MacDonald said that she had received "easily five thousand letters from all parts of the country." The request was made to give people who are not normally approached for a donation a chance to contribute.

MacDonald said that she feels that her grass-roots approach is the sort of idea that "will change the whole thrust of politics." She added that she intends to disclose all of her sources of financial support before the convention.

In reference to a question about Prime Minister Trudeau's recent statements about the future of the free enterprise system, MacDonald remarked that "most people, including himself, don't know what he's talking about." MacDonald was distressed that Trudeau's speech had "generated a false level of discussion across the country."

According to the Tory politician, the important things in the speech have not yet been tackled. MacDonald contended that the underlying assumption of the speech was that "big government" is the obvious opponent to "big labour" and "big corporations." She remarked that "big government becomes a refuge" and allows the Prime Minister to become "out of touch."

When asked about her stand on capital punishment, MacDonald declared herself an abolitionist. She expressed a desire to see a free vote within the party on the issue to "clarify matters." A free vote in the House of Commons means that the Members of Parliament vote according to their consciences, as opposed to voting in accordance to party policy. She is most anxious that the law, however the issue is decided, be upheld.

Speaking about abortion in Canada MacDonald insisted that "if the present law were working in the way it was intended...I'd be quite happy with that law,...but it's not." She complained that for two-thirds of the Canadian women, the law is not working. Abortion is an agonizing decision which should be made by the mother, the doctor and, if possible, the family, according to MacDonald.

The Journal asked MacDonald about the truth in rumours about Dalton Camp's role in her campaign. She dismissed the question, saying that Camp is "just not involved." Camp will not have time to do anything for her campaign, reasoned MacDonald, as he is to be a commentator on the convention for CTV.

Students interested in going to Ottawa to aid MacDonald in her campaign are urged to phone the Constituency Office (542-4964) or the Ottawa headquarters (238-8140) for details.

Meds '79 wins Corpuscle Cup

Meds '79 captured the Corpuscle Cup last week in the Blood Donor Clinic sponsored by the Engineering Society. 56.6 percent of the Meds class of '79 gave blood. A total of 1650 pints were donated.

Rehab '78 and Phys. Ed. '78 placed second and third with 41.8 percent and 34.3 percent respectively.

The Transfusion Service Plaque was won by Phys. Ed. with 29.9 percent of the school donating.

Runners-up were the faculties of Medicine (26.1 percent) and Rehabilitation Therapy (24.7 percent).

Standings for other faculties were as follows: Nursing Science 20.5 percent; Applied Science 18.6 percent; Arts and Science 15.9 percent; Theology 12.5 percent; Commerce 12 percent, Law 9.2 percent Graduates 4.1 percent and Education 1.7 percent.

The Engineering Society extends warm thanks to all those who assisted and donated.

Confront Parrott today in Ellis

Today at 4:30 in the Ellis Auditorium, Dr. Harry Parrott, will address Queen's faculty and students on matters pertaining to post-secondary education in Ontario. Dr. Parrott is the Minister for Colleges and Universities. This is an open meeting, and anyone interested in talking to Parrott is urged to attend. He will field any questions you may have on post-secondary education. The following are some things that you might keep in mind to ask him.

With regards to the McKeough-Henderson Report: Whenever you ask a member of the government when the ideas of the report are going to be implemented, you're always told that they are nothing but recommendations. How soon can students and taxpayers expect the contents of the Report to stop being recommendations and start becoming policy?

Also concerning the Report: It has been rumoured that even if some of the recommendations are not implemented, the report is an important statement of Government philosophy. Is this an accurate assessment? How realistic is the idea of a 65 percent tuition increase at some time in the future?

Tuition fees have been frozen for 1976-77 and there has been an increase in the amount of money available for grants. Are these merely election ploys, or can students place some long-range faith in them?

With the phasing out of the Departmental Examinations on a province-wide scale, there is no standard measurement of achievement in Ontario. Also under fire is the fact that the worth of a University degree is slipping. Does Parrott see these issues as problems and has he any plans for rectifying the situation?

What real effect did the recent Ontario Federation of Students Rally in Toronto have on government policy?

In the recent election campaign at Queen's, much has been made over the quality of education and the purpose of a person's stay at University. Does he see the purpose of a university education as merely job-training, or does he acknowledge some other value to it? Does he have any views on the problems that holders of non job-directed degrees are having in locating employment?

Finally, with the lack of summer jobs, how does Parrott feel on the following idea? During his recent trip to Cuba, Prime Minister Trudeau is said to have agreed in principle with the Cuban system of having students work in the fields in the summer. Does Parrott see this idea, or some modified form of it, as being useful in Ontario?

Interviews by Fredricka Birke

A bill to abolish capital punishment probably will be introduced in Parliament on February 9. Since 1962, no death sentence has been carried out in Canada. Yet with an increase in the number of violent crimes, and nine men currently under sentence of death, this issue has come under strong criticism. The Journal questioned Queen's students on their views on capital punishment and whether they support a national referendum on this issue.

Michael Spencer

"I'm afraid of over-reaction by both the public and the government," was the reply of Michael Spencer (Politics '77). "I do not think that the public is well enough informed to make a decision on capital punishment at a national referendum, and right now, I don't even think the House of Commons is that well informed either." Michael said he believed, however, that something eventually will have to be done, that tougher punishment eventually will be needed. Michael said, "We're dealing with the basic question: Is it right to take the life of someone who has taken someone elses'?" According to Michael, one's gut reaction would be to do away with these criminals, yet one can then question whether it is our right, or even in our power to do so. "Somewhere a happy medium must be derived, yet I don't know where," stated Michael, yet he expressed the opinion that crimes entailing pre-meditated murder definitely had to be dealt with more seriously. "It is a subject of the conscience and on one's morals," Michael concluded. "Morally I am undecided, yet consciously I suppose I want capital punishment."

Craig Sanders

Vicki Pratt (Sociology '76) was opposed to capital punishment. "As long as there is room for rehabilitation, execution cannot be justified," was her reply. Since capital punishment is such a 'controversial issue' Vicki was in favour of holding a national referendum, rather than allowing only government officials the task of making this decision. Vicki noted, "Statistics have shown that capital punishment has not been that effective in warding off crimes of passion or those which are premeditated." With this in mind, Vicki added, "Capital punishment is neither a solution nor deterrent for the murdering of officers or prison guards." Perhaps a less severe form of punishment other than capital punishment is needed, was Vicki's suggestion; however, she realized those in high risk jobs such as prison guards and police should have stronger public support. "I'm not advocating capital punishment, but rather the most severe sentence other than this which can be applied."

Vicki Pratt

Craig Sanders (Commerce '79) was uncertain as to how effective a national referendum on capital punishment would be. "The average Joe on the street is not adequately informed, and too often leaves things to his emotions." Craig suggested that writing to one's MP would possibly be a more secure way of pushing views on the matter. "MP's are used to making large-scale objective decisions, while the average person isn't." Craig felt capital punishment should not deal with 'just the average murderer', and in his opinion premeditated murder was "quite a different thing." "It's hard to even say with pre-meditated murder, though; I guess you'd have to take a close look at each specific situation." Craig admitted however, that in doing this the purpose of having laws would, in a sense, be defeated. "A law is needed to generalize. Though looking at each specific situation might be helpful, a final decision, based upon law, has to be made somehow." Though an initial impact would likely be felt, Craig felt that capital punishment would not make much difference in the long run.

White and Rawlyk: humanizing gov't

Tim Greenwood

Canada's present political system is "ineffective, frustrating and at some point will be abandoned," declared John White in his lecture on "The Humanizing of Government Policy", last Friday night.

The lecture was the fourth in the Dunning Trust series. White, a former Ontario cabinet minister, was joined on the stage by Dr. G.A. Rawlyk, who was hastily obtained to replace a snowed-in Stephen Lewis.

Recognizing the audience's disappointment at the absence of Lewis, Conservative White expressed the fear that the remaining onlookers were "all staunch fans of Stephen Lewis" but suggested that his own presence demonstrated that "whether you like Tories or not, we're always on the job."

Approaching the formidable challenge posed by the lecture topic, White chose to narrow his focus and suggested the answer lies in the "deconcentrating and decentralizing" of the government. He stated that a centralized government was acceptable while communication was inefficient, but today with instantaneous communication, it is intolerable

White said that the present "homogeneous" nature of government policy, in which the entire province is treated as a single entity, could only lead to discontent. To illustrate this, he offered the law forbidding the use of ice studs on tires. Studs are not needed in Southern Ontario where they rip up the roads, but he suggested that they are very useful in northern communities like Kenora.

White stated that the government is now taking steps in the right direction, but that more needed to be done. To improve the situation, regional governments are being instituted and and communities are being given more legislative power

To further ameliorate the problem White suggested that more "unconditional grants" be provided and that more active neighbourhood groups should spring up Finally he suggested that the federal government should restrict itself to the sectors of the "post office, armed services and foreign trade" and refrain from matters of "health, education and transportation" which should be provincial matters.

After the first lecture was finished, Dr Rawlyk, who had little chance for preparation, attempted to refute what he had just heard.

Rawlyk said he was very "disturbed" by what White had suggested for he felt that such decentralization could only have serious repercussions. He stated emphatically that such a policy would open the door to increased "economic penetration by the U.S." With communities now set adrift from the larger government, the "multi-national corporations" would be "able to squeeze or extract far more favourable deals." Rawlyk asked how a small province like New Brunswick could stand up to the strength of a K.C. Irving, or what would be done about BC which "loves multi-national corporations with no thought about the ecology or tomorrow."

Rawlyk also felt that White's viewpoint emerged from the fact that he had lived in Ontario, the richest province of all, and Rawlyk wondered how this decentralization would influence equitable distribution of the wealth among the provinces

Rawlyk considered White's whole argument "basically unconvincing." He stated that a government formed along White's prescribed lines would be unable "to serve all our people and stand up to outside pressures."

Queen's art conservation

The Art Department at Queen's has instituted a program that is unique in Canada, that of Master of Art Conservation.

In a speech at the official opening of the new quarters of the program in the Agnes Etherington Art Centre, Jennifer McQueen, Deputy Director of the Canadian Conservation Institute, emphasised the needs of the field of art conservation as being "service, training and research." There is a "desperate need" for the trained conservators and conservation scientists that are coming out of the Queen's program.

Dean Reid reappointed

Mrs. Evelyn Reid has been reappointed as Dean of Women for a further term extending from September 1, 1976 to August 31, 1979, on the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on the Appointment of the Dean of Women.

Before making its recommendation, the Advisory Committee gave extensive consideration to a review of the changing role which the post might fill in a time of transition within the University. One of the Committee's suggestions was that the activities of the Dean of Women should extend beyond the residences as broadly as possible within the University community.

Tindall honoured

Principal Watts has announced that the Board of Trustees has decided to commemorate the long service of retiring football and basketball coach Frank Tindall. As a permanent honour, the field at the corner of Albert and Union Streets (behind Vic hall) will be known from now on as the Frank Tindall Field.

As a further honour, a plaque will be placed in the upper lobby of the Phys Ed. Centre to record the names of the most valuable players in both football and basketball since 1948, Tindall's first year here.

Furthermore, the football room at the George Richardson Stadium will be named the Frank Tindall Room and will contain a picture of this highly admired man.

A testimonial dinner will be held in the Jock Harty Arena on Saturday, May 15.

At the end of a term: John Wilson

bottomley

Nancy Bowes

"The truth about this position is that it becomes whatever the person filling it is." Thus did John Wilson, Vice-President (University affairs), sum up the position he has held for the last year.

With a new executive preparing to move into the AMS office, the Journal interviewed one of the less well-known members of this past year's AMS Executive, John Wilson.

Despite "mixed feelings" about the year, Wilson reported that overall, he was happy. Because of a concern that there is a "concentration of power in a few hands" in the housing market, he wishes that a tenants' association had been formed. It pleases him that the new Executive plans to work on that. Wilson feels that one of the most important results of this year's work is the establishment of an effective liaison with the Mayor and Aldermen of Kingston.

Wilson's position as Vice-President (University Affairs) meant also being the AMS representative to Senate. He feels that Senators look at the AMS differently now. "In the past it's been a matter of going along with the flow," but, added Wilson, "we were willing to go out and change the system."

To exemplify the Executive's initiative in matters relating to the Senate, Wilson pointed out that the AMS had asked for representation on the Senate Committee for Academic Development (SCAD), a committee vital to the interests of students. The compromise reached allows the Vice-President (University Affairs) to be an ex-officio member of SCAD.

Wilson credited Peter Lane, External Affairs Commissioner, with helping to orient him to the senate.

When asked for advice for the next Vice-President (University Affairs), Wilson said that the person must establish himself early and define the limits of his position.

"I would hope that they would continue on the same critical level at Senate," remarked Wilson. He recognized the necessity of having someone who would "have the guts to stand up and disagree."

In February of 1975 when the original executive met no opposition, Wilson was quoted in the Journal as saying that "I think that this is the strongest team that Queen's has seen in a long time!" The Journal asked Wilson if, a year later, he was bitter about the events of the past year. He admitted that he had been bitter over the various resignations and the "John Gray Affair" but insisted that he was no longer bitter.

"Ian and I have shown that if we weren't the most innovative, we were the most resilient," declared Wilson. He explained that he and Nordheimer had felt an obligation to stay in office, because if there had been a complete change-over part way through the year, "the damage would have been irreparable."

Wilson labelled himself a "one-hundred per center," saying that "nothing ever really satisfies me" unless it works out perfectly. Remembering his early days in office, Wilson said that once inside the office, he realized how little popular support he had. He surmised that they had done as good a job as they could have been expected to do, for "truly effective government can't operate in a vacuum."

The blame for the vacuum existing at Queen's lies in three places, according to Wilson. He fails to understand how any constituent could pay almost $100 "and then never give it another thought."

Despite some improvement seen by Wilson in the Journal this year, part of the blame rests on the student newspaper. He accused the Journal of "cute journalism" and a tendency to view the AMS cynically.

The rest of the blame for the lack of effective student government lies with the Executive of the AMS. The Executive must be able to popularize the issues, stated Wilson. The lack of response, however, breeds discouragement. Wilson concluded that "with an ignorant constituency, you might as well have a dictatorsbip."

When asked for any other comments on his term, Wilson proved to be a team man. He contended that "this year probably would have been a total disaster if it hadn't been for Ian. Considering the odds, he's done an outstanding job."

One man's politics

Doug Bonnell

Sunday, February 22, 1976 could be the day of one of the more classic floor fights in Canadian political history. On that day Progressive Conservatives from across the country will meet in Ottawa to select a leader. Considering the party's competence at self-destruction, that floor fight could well be as bloody as the party convention nine years earlier. At that event leader John Diefenbaker went down to defeat at the hands of Nova Scotian Premier Robert Stanfield.

There are indeed signs that such an event will take place, and letters to the editor of the Queen's Journal aren't the only indications. Over the weekend one of front-runner Claude Wagner's caucus supporters accused leadership hopeful Brian Mulroney of spending between 750,000 and 1.2 million dollars. In return Mulroney has said he will give some consideration to demanding Wagner release details of his 1972 trust fund.

But party guru Dalton Camp thinks otherwise. With increasing evidence that no clear leader will emerge on the first ballot, Camp maintains that the leadership will revolve around an extensive set of powerful candidate coalitions.

What type of groupings would such coalitions be based upon?

First there are the ideological groupings. On the right, Stevens, Hellyer, Horner and Wagner control the law-and-order, anti-government involvement wing. Just as delegates backing these four on philosophical grounds are not likely to switch to other candidates, so those supporting the moderate wing (Macdonald, Fraser and Clark) are unlikely to switch either. Both Mulroney and Gilles avoid being categorized, undoubtedly to their advantage.

Second, there are groupings based on connections. Here, columnist Geoffrey maintains, lies the key. Acknowledging Wagner the lead on the first ballot, Stevens points out the series of political connections between the campaigns of Mulroney, Macdonald, Gilles and Clark. He maintains that power lies in a second-place, first ballot finish for there, he argues, "lies the next leader of the opposition."

Finally there are personal bases of support which are incredibly soft and depend on the candidate's actions and whether or not a winner appears to be emerging. By personal bases one could point to Wagner's Quebec base or Fraser's "favourite son" following in British Columbia.

The field narrows to six leaders--Claude Wagner, Brian Mulroney, Paul Hellyer, Sinclair Stevens, Joe Clark and Flora Macdonald. Of these both Stevens and Wagner are probably in danger of static support. Vote expansion will depend on support from more than one grouping. It is possible to argue that Stevens is as stuck in an ideological mold as Wagner is stuck in Quebec.

Major columnists persist in predicting the outcome. Charles Lynch picks Paul Hellyer, Douglas Fisher predicts Stevens, Clark or Mulroney and Richard Gwyn gives the nod to Claude Wagner. For the sake of avoiding calling myself a major columnist and to avoid another deluge of letters to the editor, I will avoid predicting anything. But I could tell you who I'd like to see win.....

Doug Bonnell is a Queen's delegate to the PC convention and is voting for Kingston MP Flora Macdonald.

Canadian showcase

Nancy Bowes

Perspectives Canada, "a complete showcase of things strictly Canadian," will take place on campus March 2 - 5.

The series of events is sponsored by ASUS and the AMS to provide something which, according to Bob Atkinson, ASUS President, "has been lacking on this campus."

In the evening of Tuesday March 5, a forum on poverty in Canada will be held featuring speakers from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Welfare Agency and various charities and half-way houses.

"Arts in Canada" will be the theme for the Wednesday evening open discussion on Canadian studies in the universities.

A prominent speaker from Quebec and a representative from the Canadian organization for the Olympic Games will address the audience on Thursday evening on the theme, "Quebec".

Friday afternoon will see four speakers stating their personal views on "Canada Facing Social Change" Only two of the four speakers have been confirmed for this discussion; they are Rosemary Brown, NDP politician from British Columbia, and Larry Zolf, journalist and broadcaster.

In the evening, the audience will have a chance to question the eminent speakers and state their own views.

During the week, Canadian entertainment will be featured around the campus.

All events will be free and open to the public

There once was a theory that the Earth was the center of the universe and everything else revolved around it. This used to make sense until people tried to measure the orbits of stuff. Then there was trouble. Orbits had more convolutions than an AMS committee report

Eventually, the idea was scrapped in favour of the now popular theory that the Earth goes around the sun, etc. I can now conclusively prove otherwise.

What happens is that the Earth's atmosphere goes out forever Stuff like Jupiter is just cosmic debris floating around in it. It really does orbit the Earth, but it gets buffeted about by high velocity winds high in the Earth's omnipresent air The fad of Heliocentricity is dead.

It is not the only fad that is destined to go. Another one, drawing again on my extensive knowledge of physics, is the use of radiation as a method of heat transfer. We learn that the oldest stars use good old reliable conduction. It is easy to imagine what went on: The stars were happily conducting heat around, when some hotshot youngster, probably from California, comes up with convection. Suddenly all the stars have to convect, if they want to be "with it". Okay. The dust just clears from this brouhaha and along comes radiation, invented by Madam Curie as everybody knows. Everything is in an uproar, and suddenly radiation is a bigger thing than silly putty was. It will pass

Another passing fad is cleanliness This didn't come into the Aristocracy until a few hundred years ago, and has not yet even reached New York, just south of our own border. Tolstoy, who is very famous, didn't believe in it. It is no more than a passing whim; soon everyone will go hack to spasmodic baths every few months and smell just awful. Won't it be grand?

You bet. It will be nice when China disappears too. Not Communist China, just the delusion that China exists. Only when this is gone can we be free to recognise that the Middle of Asia is actually a large ferocious chicken No one could walk around on a chicken that big and not get eaten. Which proves that China does not exist.

My skill as a scientific researcher is well known across Campus. I urge you all to listen to me, whatever I say. You'll be better off.

By the way, a lot of people have accused me of being responsible for this column. That's silly. Nothing connected with creating this could possibly be considered responsible. The fact is that this column is the product of a hyperthyroid condition is the trees which produce the paper on which the Journal is printed. Which explains a lot, I think.

More PC Convention ping pong

Dear Editors,

Michael Daniher's letter of February 3rd in response to Doug Bonnell's biased attack on Brian Mulroney was merely a duplicate of the original misdeed. All that Mr. Daniher accomplished was to put in a "pitch" for his choice for leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. What Doug Bonnell would not admit, Michael Daniher did, for both of them. Now both have declared their support for Mr. Mulroney and Miss Macdonald respectively. Although I am not a delegate to the convention I wish to air my views on yet another candidate, the Honorable Claude Wagner.

Mr. Wagner, in my opinion, can do what neither of the aforementioned can - beat Pierre Trudeau where it counts, at the poles. He has taken a strong stance for one policy approach for all of Canada, none of this "Pierre Twodoor" approach. Mr. Wagner advocates caucus unity and as leader will demand it. Nothing has hurt the Tories more than internal disunity.

Most important of all, he is willing to attempt to put decision-making back into the hands of the people. Policy will come from the grass roots level of the party and not from above as do the present government's policies. The present trend toward semiorganismic government must be stopped.

Mr. Wagner realizes that today's permissive society must be turned back into a responsible society. There is no room in the present state of our economy for increased welfare and government spending, for wage controls without price controls, or for a prime minister who goes around shouting "Vive le Castro!".

Mr. Wagner is a straight forward and powerful speaker who will put dignity and responsibility back into the prime minister's office, under his leadership, the Progressive Conservatives can and will bring down our present uninspired, insensitive, and time worn government.

To be a sport, I predict; Wagner-fifth ballot victor, Hellyer, Mulroney, Macdonald.

Drew S. Gunsolus

xxxx

Dear Editors,

In the last two editions of the Queen's Journal, Doug Bonnell has received a lot of criticism for his statement concerning PC Leadership candidate, Brian Mulroney.

Although Mr. Bonnell should have stated that he was a Flora MacDonald supporter before he berrated Mr Mulroney, I feel that the letter from the Executive of the Queen's PC Association was both poor in content and lacking in factual substance. The criticisms Bonnell made were worthy of debate and instead he receives only meaningless invective and empty rhetoric.

In an article in the Whig-Standard (Friday, Feb. 6), it was estimated that Mr. Mulroney would be spending from $750,000 to $1.2 million on his leadership campaign. In these times of inflation, this lavish use of money opposes the policy of restraint being practised by federal, provincial, and local governments, alike. Mr. Bonnell's comment, "In the tactics, financing, and image of the Mulroney candidacy can be found the remains of an older, less realistic period", seems to be proving true.

Also, I would like to ask the Queen's PC Assoc. Executive if Mr. Mulroney has been really struggling to keep the PC Party alive in 'Grit'-entrenched Quebec", then why did he never offer to run in a federal election when the Tories were so in need of credible candidates in that province?

Having been an active member of the Queen's PC Association for the last five years, I am very disappointed in the Executive's latest action. Their accusations are shaky at best. I would certainly like to see the evidence that Dalton Camp is backing Flora MacDonald, since he is considered "the kiss of death" to any candidate he supports. And if Allan Eagleson is "young and reform-minded", I'm voting NDP.

Finally, I object to a letter being sent on behalf of an executive when not all of its members knew of its existence and content. Such action is irresponsible and unworthy of those involved.

Partisanship should not come before objectivity in both journalism and the criticism thereof.

Dear Editors,

I wish to respond to criticisms laid against me during the past two weeks over a recent column on Brian Mulroney. I must say that I understand the criticisms of Mr. Daniher quite succinctly. I should have stated my partisanship on the matter. It was, however, an independent opinion and it saddens me that it should be linked to a particular candidate's campaign.

This is not to say that my criticisms of Mr. Mulroney's campaign--in terms of financing and tactics--do not remain. I would sincerely like those questions answered.

Finally, I must say I am deeply hurt by the attack of the PC executive. It is an unnecessary and very violent attack on my person and its most profound quality is its use of lengthy, if somewhat meaningless adjectives.

Our highest award and the Editor who declined

Terry Collins

"Admission to the Tricolor Society shall be regarded as the highest tribute that can be paid a Student for valuable service to the University in non-athletic, extra-curricular activities."-AMS Constitution.

Established in 1940, the Tricolor Society began with 10 members and has averaged an additional 10 new members per year. At present there are almost 365 people in the Society. Of late, the AMS Committee which chooses the recipients of this award has been extremely selective in determining the people so honoured. In the past three years they have given only twelve awards to eligible students, which is less than the total number given in 1970 alone. The committee is comprised of 20 students across campus who represent a wide variety of faculties and student agencies.

The Queen's Review presented an article in 1959 which read in part, "While there has generally been no criticism of those chosen, the problem of omission has proven to be a sore point. Referring again to the AMS Constitution we find that "A minimum number of students shall be admitted to the Tricolor Society each year so as not to jeopardize the distinction of this Society." But how is the "minimum number" to be chosen from those who have rendered "valuable service to be defined?

This question was first brought into the public eye in 1947 when Gerry Stoner, Journal editor at the time, declined the honour of being admitted to the Tricolor Society. In the Journal of Friday, February 28, he wrote:

"I deeply appreciate the honour conferred on me when the Alma Mater Society granted me a Tricolor Award. I regret that my convictions are such that I cannot accept. I trust that those who graciously made the award will receive my withdrawl in the sincere spirit in which it was made.."

Stoner when stated his objections to the justification of the Tricolor Society, bringing forth several weak points which, to this day, have not been overcome. His argument went as follows:

"Much of our confusion today arises from the lip service to principles which no longer accord with the institution actually used to express them. These institutions, lacking a theoretical justication in the accepted ethical or rational forms, should not be recognized as respectable or legitimate.

"The Tricolor Society of Queen's University is such an institution.

"There is little doubt of the high nature of the principle that inspires the annual awards of the Society, namely a recognition of outstanding service to the University. The question arises by whom and by what standard shall the nominees be chosen? Shall the final settlement be elective, arbitrary or fortuitous?...

"We do not disagree with any of the other selections made this year. But does the Society extend far enough to include all those people who have worked eagerly for the good of the University? Can any society hope to cover such a field and still restrict its nmmbers?

The question is one of omission but there appears no logical norm around which to classify potential candidates. In making an absolute declaration of a man's worth to the University there will arise great differences of opinion.

"Is it the scholar, or the man who devotes time to extra-curricular activities at the expense of schoolwork, who makes the greater contribution? Is it the widely publicized member of the student government, or the little known president of the Biology club or the S.C.M. who yields his time most unselfishly? Are the eventual selections those people whom the student body at large would elect to such an honour?

"These are only a few of the questions which put the ultimate selections beyond the scope of any group who would arbitrarily decide on the awards."

Despite Stoner's eloquent objections in 1947, the Tricolor Award is still bestowed on students who meet the Committee's criteria. It is still emblematic of an outstanding contribution to Queen's.

Source material for this column was found among the files of the Alumni Association. Our sincere thanks are extended to Mr. Murray Gill and Mr. Herb Hamilton for their assistance during the production of the column. Special thanks, too, to Mr. Gerry Stoner and Mr. George LaFleur

Action needed on Theatre fund

Dear Editors,

May I be allowed to express some of my views on the recent Theatre Building Fund disclosures?

That $32,000 should have been transferred to the Queen's Capital Campaign Fund without the knowledge, let alone the consent, of the four permanent trustees of the fund, is disturbing and surely extremely discourteous, to say the least. All of them, even the member living in England, could easily have been contacted.

I should like to know who had the signing authority in 1972 to authorize such a transfer? To the best of my knowledge this is the first time this matter has been exposed to the Queen's community. If this is in fact the case, why has it taken so long?

This matter has been brought to the attention of everybody, and especially the four permanent trustees of the fund, through the Queen's Journal and in particular the diligent researching by your Arts Editor, Alan Mann. It is through the Journal that a detailed explanation of what happened in 1972 and why should be given. It had better be good.

I wonder how many other funds at Queen's have been treated in the same way as the Theatre Building Fund?

Poor line-ups at Dunning

Dear Editors,

I would like to know where the idea of "first come, first serve", has gone I am referring to the mass attack on the doors for the Dunning Flicks. There is obviously a need for directions as to how a line is formed. I believe that Grade One students could have formed a line better than was displayed last night by Queen's students! I find it extremely difficult to comprehend the ignorance of some students, when they see a line has been formed, by preceding to form another one or as the case last night two other lines. How does one justify the fact of someone arriving 45 minutes before the show unable to get in, but someone arriving 5 minutes before the show gets the choice of the house. There is definitely a need for supervision when the lines are being formed!

Verstand and vernunft

Dear Editors:

I should like to thank Mr. Mason for re-invoking Professor Kierans' rhetoric. However, amid his pejorative personalizations and dutiful outline of the words of the prophet, Mr. Mason neglected to confront the issue that I outlined as seminal to the Kieransean position. On what basis does Kierans formulate his conclusion that once the legislative action outlined (by Kierans or Mason, take your pick,) is enacted, will government suddenly begin to represent the needs of all the people? Given the separation of state and civil society, such an ideal is an illusory mystification of economic, political and social reality.

Mr. Mason, if Heilbroner's book is too long, and you can't bear to read Marx, perhaps Arthur Hailey's The Moneychangers (p.126-138) will serve as some novel enlightenment.

Finally, your letter seems to stand as a glowing empirical verification of Jurgen Habermaus's position that, not only does the ethos of instrumental rationality lack a critical perspective, but the unidimensional pursuit and study of positivist conceptions of verstand exists in contemporary society to the detriment and demise of vernunft.

Rob Beamish.

Good job by photographers

Dear Editors,

Lest your readers be snowed under by the weight of unfavourable comment about Cameron-Sparks, let me add a few words on their behalf. It has been suggested that good portraits are given - not taken. I cannot agree, some of the most famous photographic portraits, Karsh's well-known photo of Churchill for example, are virtually stolen. The portrait photographer has only a short time to get to know his subject, and the sitting must necessarily be devoted to trying to get the subject to relax and at the same time project some element of himself which will form the basis of a good portrait. I can claim at least some knowledge of the process as I used to earn some pocket money from time to time by taking portraits of children.

The reception I received at Cameron-Spraks was very friendly. The photographer was willing to try some ideas I had, even though the end product was not all that I had hoped. The quality of the proofs was excellent. When I placed my order, all the proofs were returned. Though the final prints were not the best I have ever seen they were good value for the money. Better quality is available to be sure, but only at substantially greater cost, from what I have seen.

I cannot comment on the quality of Mr. Berry's work because I haven't seen a recent example of it. Students should keep in mind though, that he may be reacting as best he can to what amounts to a quasi-monopoly situation enjoyed by Cameron-Sparks. Faced by the deadlines and limitations and the huge numbers, Cameron-Sparks are doing an admirable job.

Allan McN. Austin.

Thanks fellows

This is a letter to thank all the terrific guys in Brockington, Gordon, Leonard and McNeil who gave up their munchie money and penny collections for A wing's Foster Child Fund. Thanks ever so much for all your support. We collected a little over $100 and are planning to canvas Women's Residences after Reading Week

Thanks again to everyone!

Brigadoon review is unfair

Dear Editors,

I am writing in response to the review of the musical "Brigadoon", entitled "Heroic Effort But Doomed From Start", (Friday, February 6). In his criticism of the "vacant unbelievable" plot, Larry Nightingale appears to have completely missed the point of the story. "Brigadoon" should not be viewed in the cold, mechanistic light of a "science fiction time warp." It is an idealistic fairy-tale and love-story written purely for the entertainment of the audience. Little effort, involving only a lively imagination and a certain degree of perception, is all that is necessary to clearly understand the general plot.

Another mistaken impression of Mr. Nightingale requires correction as well. The great bulk of the preparation for the musical took place only in the five weeks prior to the performance. Obviously, the 'months' of work referred to in the article represent a gross exaggeration.

Inasmuch as the audience, if not Larry Nightingale, seemed to enjoy themselves thoroughly, the production clearly accomplished the purpose for which the musical was written. The performance of "Brigadoon" was truly entertaining and well worth seeing.

Dear Editors:

It is my opinion that the review of the Q.M.T. production, "Brigadoon", which played at the Grand Theatre last week, was one of the most unfair reviews I have ever read. The critic seemed to disapprove of the music, choreography, and subject material which he calls a "vacuous, mindless property to work with". On this he has the right to his opinion, as I do mine, but to let sarcastic slurs extend as he did to the entire production by the Q.M.T. is in my mind, unfair.

No credit or comment was given to the central parts: Robert Hanks as Tommy Albright was only mentioned, and Lorrie Easton as Fiona did not even get this honour! Lorrie and Bob were well cast in their roles both as actress and actor and as fine musicians. Julie Salverson as Meg Brockie was delightful and also Glen Piper as Harry Beaton, but to say the overall level of singing was the weakest in years is a gross unfairness.

The Q.M.T. production was not without its faults, it had some problems as could be expected with any such a large scale work, especially on opening night. In short, I don't think that Friday's review was fair to the people or the production of Brigadoon.

Dear Editors:

We take great objection to the review of Brigadoon by Larry Nightingale. He obviously has no imagination and lacks any knowledge of musical productions. The plot of Brigadoon was exactly as musical plots should be; simple and imaginative, not deeply philosophical. It was neither vacuous nor mindless as the reviewer stated. He shows his complete lack of musicality by his inferences that there were no good soloists, and that the show was replete with flat singing. To the contrary, pitch and tone throughout was quite acceptable. All the soloists were a pleasure to listen to, especially Robert Hanks, who has one of the finest voices at Queen's. In order to have made such statements, Mr. Nightingale must already have passed judgement on both the play and the players before the curtain ever rose. He should publicly apologize for downgrading the most solid musical entertainment Queen's has produced this year.

Arts Festival Incident bandied

Dear Editor:

This is a statement read at the 19 January poetry reading in Rm. 517 Watson Hall

Due to the ineptness evident in the non-organization of this event and the entire Art's Festival, we, Jim Smith, Stuart MacKinnon and Dave Skeaff, refuse to dignify such a less than token effort by reading our material, and consider the thoughtless laziness of the supposed organizers of this event, Dave Eadie and Jamie Scott, to be an insult to anyone concerned with the state of the arts at Queen's.

Out of the same concern which prompted this protest, we pose several questions to the organizers which they must answer to justify themselves.

1. Why was there no effort expended in advertising the time and speakers of this event until the very day that it takes place, mere hours before the reading itself? This hardly encourages attendance.

2. Why was there no time placed in the Journal advertisement on Friday for these readings? This was the only prior notice that there was an event at all.

3. Why was there no effort made to confirm who was to read on which night, and for how long? An event does not organize itself.

Jim Smith, Stuart MacKinnon, Dave Skeaff and others.

Dear Editors:

We, the signifiers, do wish it known, our bloodred fury and bleeding indignation, at the egotistical tragicalclown circus tricks, at the drivelling firedribbling, of Ratgod Schmidt - a generous and cheap crinklylipped orifice he, of Rasputin MacKennell, that Dancing-bear with weekend swollen balls, of the invisible and anonymous Scruff, and of all their pigmy rabblement of Bolshy malcontents.

What a shocking mocking of a solemn and festival occasion!--for which, therefore, it seems fit to defend hereby 'Universitatis Reginae res artium', from all future thinkless cool-ultures with tar in their wings, or, suffice it to say, buffalochips on their shoulders

Now down hard goes the glove!--to be answered (perhaps) with words of their preference, on the calendersquare of their choice

Let them rave to the razoring wind! Let them beat their wellcarved empty skulls 'gainst the hardcap greatlake ice!

For, as the oracle saith: 'Only out of the cleft touchstone will works of true wit flow forth full-forged'

If it needs to be said, should it not always be said elsewhere?

And so we remain unashamedly yours,

Jamie S. Scott, impressario eminentissimo -- in comparison and David A.Eadie, comptroller par excellence -- tho' barely given handhelp.

Essays: the downfall of all great geniuses

One of the worst hassles in high school or university is essay writing and it has caused the downfall of many erstwhile geniuses. However, with an ordered, logical approach to essay-writing, even the worst writer can consistently pass and often gets B's and A's. If you believe me, read on.

Before starting, you generally have to choose a topic. You have a wide choice here: choose the one the Prof. likes best:choose the hardest: choose the easiest one: or choose the one that most interests you. In most cases, the last method is best. If a topic interests you, your essay will be better. Simple as that.

There is only one overriding concern in the research end of the essay; the person who doesn't know his subject, nine times out of ten doesn't get the marks. Let us not kid ourselves, the professors have spent many years studying the things you write about and bullshitting past them is not going to be at all easy. Oh, it can be done, but it's generally much easier to do things the orthodox way in the first place. Certainly the gamble is less.

The first major type of research is interviewing and here there are three points to remember:

1. Don't be afraid to ask people to be interviewed. Most people like to air their views, or even talk to someone new. Besides, very few people bite.

2. Make notes if you can't remember all that is said. Remember, you are out to get the truth, not a garbled version of what you think was said.

3. The idea in an interview is for the other person to talk, so shut up.

For the more timid or more overworked student, two other avenues of research are open: periodicals and books. These are much easier than the first person methods, but generally require better writing for the same marks. The average Professor is impressed by in-person research and forgives many other faults in an essay because of it. However, due to time and facilities, it is often necessary to write an essay relying on secondary sources.

Library research can be very complex, but a few points stand out in the mind:

1. Take your time. Give yourself a whole afternoon in the library, rather than a couple of one-hour stints.

2. Don't be afraid to ask for assistance from the librarians (not the assistants). In the larger libraries (where you should be), the librarians generally know their way around pretty well.

3. Get comfortable: If there are easy chairs, sprawl out in one with your books around you. Relax. Libraries should be very easy-going and relaxing places.

4. Don't overlook smaller periodicals, clippings, files, house organs and scholarly works. Often they will have really new insights into your subject.

There are the main methods of research. However, often the best essays come from totally unorthodox methods of information gathering, ones that have required imagination and creativity. Don't sell originality short; if you have a new idea or approach, try to use it. Film, encounter sessions and a number of other original ideas have produced A and A-plus essays for people whose writing ability is limited. Fear not your own head. Use it. That's what it's there for.

When you have bribed the Prof to give you an A regardless, then you can dispense with an outline. Until then, think of it as totally essential. A clear, well-thought-out outline will more than half the time and mean the difference between a pass and a failure and almost always will make the difference between a B-plus and an A.

Take a l[oo]k at your material-notes, interviews, q[ue]stionnaires (if any), and anything else y[ou] have; think hard about the subject; play [a]round with it in your mind - let it form ideas a[nd] connections. Often a natural order for the e[ss]ay will form itself from this. A historical ess[ay], for example, is often naturally chr[on]ological and anything else spoils it. Simi[la]rly an opinion essay using a syllogistic ch[ai]n (A causes B, B causes C, etc.) has its [ow]n built-in pattern. If such a pattern come[s] in your essay, use it without argument.

Failing this, t[he]re are several stock methods of ordering y[ou]r facts. Pick the best one for your essay:

1. Chrono[lo]gical

2. From [the] weakest (least important) point to the st[ro]ngest (most important) point.

3. From [th]e strongest point to the weakest.

4. Strong[es]t, then weakest, to second strongest.

5. Secon[d] strongest, then weakest to strongest.

6. Rando[m] order (all points equal and unrelated). A[vo]id.

Once you have chosen the best order, fit in your points. Pare out those you don't need and put aside those that don't fit into your order. When you have finished this, the topics should flow freely from one to the other.

There are often things that don't fit. Most often it is some related topic that must be included, but is not part of the main topic. Such things are best put between your last point and your conclusion. Alternatively, they can be disposed of right at the beginning, but this is more difficult and less effective.

Add to your outline an introduction and a conclusion and you have a basis for writing. All that remains for your outline is to put down a couple of the major points for each topic, as reminders. The detail you put into this is governed by your skill as a writer. The better writer needs only a sketchy point form, but the poor writer should put down every single point he wishes to say, in the order he intends to say them.

Don't fool around with introductions. They are dangerous things when not in the hands of experts and most people should get rid of them in a hurry.

Except in opinion essays (and even then, sometimes), the introductions should be a brief statement of what is going to be said in the essay. No points should be made, or arguments put forward. Two or three sentences is quite enough, and short ones at that.

The only exception to this hard and fast rule is the literary essay, one in which the style is all-important. Generally an opinion essay, this type is probably the hardest to write and introductions are the hardest part. No one can help you with this. There is only one thing that can be of guidance to you; don't be flashy. As we will see later, simplicity, clarity and brevity pay much higher rewards than florid adjective-ridden prose. If your introduction is short and to the point, leave it. Don't spoil a good thing.

Contrary to public belief the body is not the hardest part of writing an essay. Frankly, if you have followed previous points with any degree of success and you speak English, you already have a pass essay guaranteed.

The body of the essay generally writes itself and shouldn't take too much time or effort. In order to increase that pass to a B or an A though, there are a number of pointers that help:

1. Clarity. Strive for it. In an essay, there is not a single more important aspect than being understood. Try something out on a friend who doesn't know the subject, if you are in doubt as to how clear it is.

2. Related to the first point, avoid redundancies. With a few exceptions, repetition of arguments and points bores the reader and your mark goes right down. Also, a redundant piece is often very confusing and we can't have that.

3. Avoid using superlatives and overstatements. If you continually say something is the "best" or the "greatest", people are going to turn you right off and you'll never make your point. If anything, understate your points slightly. A reader often likes to think that the conclusions are coming from his head and a good teacher sees this technique.

4. Avoid adjectives and adverbs in favour of nouns and verbs. The latter have much more power, so use more of them and less of the others. Also any good Prof will recognize the use of descriptive words for padding in a short essay. Remember, if your essay is good, the length doesn't matter.

5. Don't plagiarize anyone. You can rest assured that the professor is well read in your essay topic and is apt to spot copying on first glance. Result: good-bye course.

6. Original forms - don't be afraid to use them. If point form or numbered points are necessary, use them. Can you imagine this article if all my points were in paragraphs? However, don't use these other methods because they're easier, or faster, and never use them if the Prof says he doesn't like them.

7. Most important, don't be afraid to revise the rewrite. If something isn't quite right, make it right. This is marks you're talking about, not just a lark. A professional writer will spend as much as 10 times as many hours on revisions as on the first draft. That's why he gets paid for writing.

Of course, there are more points to consider; spelling, grammar, and all that nonsense. Above all, try not to be boring, but still make your points. Actually it's not all that difficult, as writing a couple of essays this way will soon show you.

The easiest conclusion is a rephrasing of the introduction. Say what you have told the reader, in case he didn't get it the first time. This works when your opinions (secondary conclusions) are contained within your points.

If this is not the case - if your points lead up to one big conclusion - then make it and sign off quickly. In this situation, the "big point" should be in the last or second to last paragraph.

The same problems apply to conclusions as they do to introductions. The easiest way to solve them is to make your conclusion short and get it out of the way fast. It is to be hoped that, in the future, introductions and conclusions will somehow be miraculously abolished. In the meantime, cultivate a healthy fear of them, for your own protection.

It would be useless to go into all the wierdo rules that some Profs have for essays: size of margins, placement of footnotes and all sorts of nonsense that has nothing to do with learning. The only way you find out those things is to ask the person. Then follow their rules. It can't hurt.

But there are a couple of overall things that you can do to help your marks. A typewritten essay will get about a half a mark (C-plus to B-minus) more than a handwritten essay, no matter how good your long-hand is. Type double spaced; on one side of the paper only. If there are more than five pages, you should have a title page (name, class, title - that sort of stuff). Don't forget to number every page and put your name on every page.

Incidentally, a coffee ring on your title page may make it look like you were working into the early morning hours, but it won't get you any more marks.

Let's face it, writing a good essay is not the easiest thing in the world to do. If it were, there wouldn't be so many failures, but a little more effort and an analytical approach generally will solve the essay-writing problem for the average student.

By the way, don't be afraid of writing an essay. After all, the worst that can happen is that you flunk.

Le Voyage d'Ottawa

Trissotin, qui ce jour-là était mal rasé, se tourna vers Vadius et lui dit:
- Il neige de plus belle.
- Je le vois bien, grommela celui-ci.

Ils continuérent à arpenter la mosa'lque pseudo-bizantine du hall de la gare de Toronto. Le voyage d'Ottawa s'annoncait plutot mal. Le matin, alors qu'ils devaient partir dans la voiture de Bélise, celle-ci leur avait téléphoné pour annuler le voyage. De dépit, ils avaient décidé de prendre le train afin d'être rendus le soir meme à Ottawa. Mais la compagnie des chemins de fer venait d'annoncer qu'à cause des deux verges de neige tombées en l'espace de trois heures, le train d'Ottawa aurait un retard que la compagnie n'était pas en mesure de calculer.
- Nous allons tout rater.
- Si nous rentrions chez nous?
- Jamais de la vie. Il ne sera pas dit qu'une misérable précipitation de blancs flocons aura raison de notre détermination.

Vadius, les deux mains derriére le dos, s'arreta comme perdu dans ses pensées. Trissotin, n'entendant plus le martélment régulier de ses pas, en fit de meme. Ils se regardérent. Enfin, un sourire de triomphe émergea du visage renfrogné de Vadius.

C'est Gide je crois qui un jour dit:
"Dis-moi ce que tu lis, je te dirai qui tu es."
Eh bien, que dire j'une personne qui passe son temps a lire des oeuvres romanesques (traduites ou non), des "Tintin", des "Asterix" etc...; pas grand'chose direz-vous. En effet, mais au moins ces gens-là font l'effort de cultiver leur talent en francais.
Vous trouverez à l'entrée de Victoria Hall, plusieurs jeunes filles pretes à vous aider sur votre choix de lecture et à vous guider sur la voie de la sagesse. Les livres sont de niveaux trés divers et vous pourrez certainement en trouver un qui attirera votre attention. Venez donc passer une heure d'agréable lecture; vous pouvez également emprunter le livre de votre choix pour une semaine.
Les heures d'ouverture sont:
le lundi de 9h30 a 10h30 et de 13h30 a 15h30
le mardi de 9h30 a 10h30, de 12h30 a 13h30 et de 14h30 a 15h30
le jeudi de 9h30 a 12h30.

Ces heures ne conviennent évidemment pas à tout le monde. C'est pourquoi nous pensons les changer d'ici peu. Si vous avez des suggestions à ce propos, écrivez une lettre au Journal, faisant part de votre avis; ou bien, allez tout simplement parler à une des charmantes jeunes filles.

Nous voudrions remercier Mlle. Cynthia David pour la revue excellente à notre sujet. Tu as trés bien compris ce que c'est que de vivre sur un étage de francais. Pour montrer notre appréciation, nous te nommons membre, à titre honoraire, des femmes fatales

Poèmes

La mer

Noble mer qui déferle sur la plage,
Capricieuse mer, au seul bruit de tonnerre, tu nour montre ta rage.
Le pecheur, son filet vide, rale,
Tandis que tute fais douce et pale,
Sous l'oeil enflammé du soleil couchant.
Voici que de ton aile battant violemment,
Un coquillage frappe le sable
Pour être ramassé ensuite d'un seul mouvement de ton bras.
Pauvre mer que le vent accable,
A quoi te comparer sinon à une femme?
Sur la plage tu rejettes tes tristes larmes,
Et rends lourds les grains de sable
Et l'ame des pecheurs.
Coquette, meme dans test moments de furie,
Tu te pares de diamants et de chapeaux de dentelle blanche.
Mer enchanteresse, pourquoi les hommes t'aiment-ils tant?
Pourquoi acceptent-ils de mourir dans ton sein?
La beauté de tes vagues roulant sous le vent,
Captive, je ne sais comment,
Leur esprit, leur coeur, leur âme.

Esker Mike review

Almost ice and snow

There is a surfeit of theatre productions in town at the moment, but the few people who passed-up the more popular and well-known shows and attended Herschel Hardin's Esker Mike and his wife Agiluk on Saturday night were treated to a fine performance.

Nancy Palk, as Agiluk, finally has a part with some teeth in it. The department still has her typecast as a mother, but the role of Agiluk has the weight and challenge which make use of her abilities. Nancy gave an admirable performance that captured the misery and determination that leads a mother of eight to cross her legs and refuse men any further access.

John Frizzel, who played her husband Esker Mike, delivered what must rank as one of his best performances. In an interview printed in the Journal last week John expressed a desire to say only brilliant things: his acting Saturday night was far better than any intellectualization he could possibly make about the play. His role, too, was difficult and like Nancy, indeed like most of the cast, he was more than equal to the challenge presented by the part.

Part of the difficulty of the play is caused by Herschel Hardin's text. Herschel Hardin is a psuedonym for a man who was once editor of the Queen's Journal back in the late fifties): this probably explains a lot about the awkwardness of his style. Since when has "excrement" been normal part of the Eskimo vocabulary? In one scene Mike Saver, the Minister of Northern Affairs, has to drop the following line on the audience: "My god! Our master plan for the north seems so far away now." Herschel's attempts to make sure we see the 'meaning' by dropping bombs like that, especially when the actions of the characters have more depth of meaning than his codicils, are less than pleasing. The cast, though, rises above the indelicacy of parts of the script to produce a performance that is far stronger and more meaningful than Hardin probably imagined.

"Esker Mike and his wife Agiluk" is showing again this weekend: if you are at all interested in theatre I recommend that you go see it. The cast and production are strong and promise a pleasurable evening to those who attend.

Oddyssy end disappointing at Domino Theatre

Donald Rayko

As everyone knows, Ulysses leaves his native Ithaca and spends ten years playing war and roasting hecatombs with a few thousand other Hellenes in a nice little place called Ilium. Eventually he invents the Trojan Rabbit (an early Mediterranean version of what you get when you cross a gift horse with a white elephant), and soon everyone is going home. Except the Trojans--they live there already, and besides, thanks to You-Know-Who and his sweaty pals, they're dead.

Anyway, Ulysses and the other Greeks set out bearing gifts and souvenir postcards and Troy-Hilton towels for the folks back home. Most of the other Greeks manage to book a direct trip, but Ulysses is something of a wanderer, and he takes the scenic route home. Finally, after seven years of sightseeing he runs out of traveller's checks, and he returns to Ithaca.

Helen MacInnes's play, Home is the Hunter, doesn't mention any of this, but it picks up the action starting from Our Hero's landing in Ithaca. In the process, the familiar story is recast into an unfamiliar mold as MacInnes lays out what "really" happened.

In principle, this is a fine idea with a venerable history. In much classical Greek drama, plot was of little consequence because audiences were familiar with the outline already; what mattered was the treatment of the story, the interpretations and particular emphases selected by a playwrite and cast.

This is the principle.

Unfortunately, it's no guarantee of an interesting play--as Home is the Hunter demonstrates. It's a trivial little play without any apparent redeeming social or artistic value. Why director Maureen Salter and the Domino Theatre organization selected it in the first, second, or ninety-ninth place is beyond me.

I confess that I feel apprehensive about crucifying any play. After all, what I present is only one person's opinion; someone somewhere may really enjoy this Domino offering, and to this remarkable soul go my best wishes. But I must also confess that I find nothing good to say about it, either.

The tacky brown flats and shoddy furnishings that passed for a set were not just unimaginative, not just boring, but irritating to look at. The costumes--sloppy sacks with head and arm holes--I found ugly, cheap and silly. The lighting was so designed and executed that players on a presumably fully lit stage might take just a few steps and all but disappear into unintended obscurity.

Economy and simplicity are perfectly acceptable--shoddiness is not. Home is all too obviously a production done on the cheap. It shouldn't look so much like defective merchandise, but it does.

I will not mention any cast members specifically: I find nothing favourable to say, and I don't want to appear personally vindictive, because I'm not. But it was very difficult to tell who was more bored--myself or the people on stage. "Listless" and "superficial" are understatements: they looked just plain bored. I could see or hear no evidence that anyone knew what he was doing, or why. Perhaps they are under-rehearsed (the brief fight episode near the end was preposterously and laughably inept); but perhaps they just don't care.

It is difficult to categorize the production. It is advertised as a comedy, but it is not funny. Nor is it a tragedy--except in a critical sense. The Greeks, however, did have a word for it: sumphora --it means "disaster".

Ulysses, the hunter, should never have come home.

The Glass Menagerie

St. Lawrence College Theatre announces its next major production, The Glass Menagerie by Tennesee Williams.

The Glass Menagerie is the highly acclaimed and well-loved classic of modern American theatre which has been staged many times since its first performance in Chicago in 1944. Set in a St. Louis tenement, the play explores complex relationships within a family during the Depression. The Mother, Amanda, has been left by her husband to raise two children - Laura and Tom. Williams, in his poignant and tender study of their characters, elicits our understanding and compassion. Thwarted by poverty, fear and loneliness, their ideals, dreams and wishes struggle to survive. For brief moments only, the real beauty and gentleness of these characters shines through, for dreams and ideals, are too delicate to survive in an alien world.

Williams makes a very personal statement in The Glass Menagerie. Much of what he says in this play clarifies and elucidates his later work.

Directed by Jo-Anne Hawley, The Glass Menagerie stars Roger Dunn, Trevor Davies, Stacey Haslam, and Heather Bonham.

Production dates are February 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21 at 8:30 p.m. For further information contact Robert Story, 544-5400, ext. 180 or 184.

Renaissance music o'erpowered

Feneta Childs

The two hour Renaissance music concert presented at St. George's Cathedral last Saturday by the Hortulani Musicae of Vancouver was technically excellent. However, on the whole, it was rather a disappointment - the choice of music was mainly uninspiring, the performance was bland, and what interesting music was played was completely dwarfed by the grandeur of the cathedral.

The main problem with the concert seemed to be one of a basic lack of volume. Even granted the fact of the more delicate tonal qualities of Renaissance instruments, the sound was often so thin that listening became a conscious effort. In fact, during some of the quieter pieces, the sounds of the ever-present coughers often succeeded in momentarily drowning out the music, although I noticed that several did their best to cough in time with it.

The weakness of sound was nowhere more apparent than in their performance of Henry VIII's "Pastyme with good companye." The version played last week on CFRC's Pro Musica was loud, lively, and bursting with infectious enthusiasm. In contrast, that of Saturday night was delicate, light and sedate, with any enjoyment refined out of existence. The problem could well lie in the choice of music: boisterous jollities are hard to express through the restraining influence of a tuxedo. It is interesting to note that out of the five performers, only the soprano ever showed any facial expression. A larger number of players would have given the much-needed volume, or, contrariwise, a smaller concert hall would have excluded the impossibilities of filling such a cavernous space with the sound of only five instruments.

Finally, much of the music was of a slow nature, some with lyrics in Italian, neither of which tend to sustain the interest of the average audience, especially when the sound is as thin as it was.

Despite these criticisms, there were also a number of enjoyable moments in the program. The performances of Ray Nurse (bass, lute and recorder), and Ingrid Suderman (soprano), were both individually outstanding. Ray Nurse was technically excellent on both lute and recorder and Ingrid Suderman's voice was exquisite, soaring beautifully upon occasion.

five pieces outstanding

Individually, five pieces seemed to me to be outstanding. The anonymous instrumental piece fourth on the program had some lovely tonal blends between the recorder, the organ, and the low notes of the viola da gamba. "My Lady Careys dompe", an organ solo, was also very well received, as was the anonymous "Galyerd" which followed it. The flowing music of the rebec and viola da gamba had an excellent contrast in the strong, well-defined beat of the lute. The performance of Ray Nurse as bass in Josquin des Pres' "Scaramella" was a pleasant surprise and could have been well-used more often. Finallly, the lute solo, "Fantasia", was probably the high point of the evening. Its running strains kept the audience intent throughout.

On the whole, then, the performance of the Hortulani Musicae made a pleasant, if uninspiring, evening. The weakness of the sound was a definite drawback, whether it was due to the small number of players or the vastness of the cathedral. The skill of the performers is undeniable, but it was not matched by any signs of enjoyment on their part or any success in involving the audience. Perhaps a change in setting and the addition of more players would help express not only the performers' excellent skills, but also the innate liveliness so characteristic of Renaissance music.

The Chuck Mangione Quartet

"My dad owned a grocery store in Rochester and in the evenings after the store was closed he used to take my brother Gap and me out to all the jazz clubs in town. I don't know how he did it, but everyone always ended up back at our house, eating spaghetti, jamming, and having a good time. And that's how I met Dizzy."

"Dizzy" is the legendary Dizzy Gillespie, who gave an upswept trumpet when he was 13 (Mangione now prefers flugelhorn). These days, the family gatherings are only as frequent as Chuck's schedule permits (although Chuck's dad is still his greatest fan), but the jam sessions have increased and the name Mangione is known throughout the jazz world. After playing piano from the age of eight and learning trumpet at ten, Chuck Mangione developed a proficiency in performing and composing which eventually led him to play in bands with such jazz notables as Maynard Ferguson, Art Blakey, Keith Jarrett, Chick Corea, and Lew Soloff (of Blood, Seat & Tears fame).

Mangione was then invited to join Rochester's prestigious Eastman School of Music, where he directed the school's Jazz Ensemble. In 1970, while at Eastman, he was asked to conduct the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in a concert of his own music. Combining his extraordinary musical talent with his impressive logistical skill and his low-keyed business acumen, he made the necessary arrangements to have the concert recorded and released as an album. He formed his own company and released a double album of the performance in the Rochester area. When the album began selling very well regionally, Mercury Records purchased the masters and released Friends & Love, the first Chuck Mangion album. Friends and Love not only sold over 150,000 units, but it was also awarded the first of the four Grammy nominations (for "Hill Where the Lord Hides") Mangione has already received during his relatively short recording career. This album was followed by a second double album, Together, again recorded live with the Rochester Philharmonic. Mangione's preference for recording live is understandable when you listen to the energy and excitement packed into these two albums. Although this technique is more risky, the results can be extraordinary. Manglone explains:

"When you are recording live, you are actually betting that you come up with a very good performance because you don't have the luxury of a second take but that challenge puts something special into the music. If it's a great performance and that magic is happening with the audience, it will be felt in the recording as well."

But recording is only part of the total Mangione experience. Both "Friends and Love" and "Together" were filmed and have been shown several times on the PBS Network. And Mangione has a "first" to his credit in the television medium as well. His recent appearance on the Merv Griffin television show - where he played and conducted "Land of Make Believe" - marked the first time that show ever presented a 12-minute continuous musical segment. More recently Chuck has appeared with his Quartet and orchestra on the Mike Douglas Show and has taped a segment for the Don Kirshner Rock Concert.

The Chuck Mangione Quartet will be appearing at Queen's on Wednesday the 25 of February at Grant Hall. Because of the expected demand for tickets, tickets will be on sale on campus before they go on sale in town. Get yours before you leave for Reading Week, cause there might not be any left when you get back.

Chuck Mangione and his Quartet will be in Grant Hall on Feb. 25.

Pryde in your plant

Rod Pryde

Successful plants cannot be bought on impulse. Find out if the plant you wish to purchase can tolerate the conditions of light, temperature and humidity present in the room. If it cannot, it will either wither and die or have stunted growth even if fed and watered properly.

It is best to buy plants from a store specializing in plants, not a grocery or variety store. Only at a plant store do plants have the care and conditions they require; also, it is less likely they will be diseased or pest-ridden. The proprietor of the store will be able to provide helpful advice on the care of your plants, something a salesperson at a grocery store might be unable to do.

It is important to compare prices of plants, as these vary from store to store.

Before buying the plant, look it over carefully. The plant should not be pot-bound--it should not have roots sticking out from a hole in the bottom of the pot. The plant should have a thick stem, as this indicates a mature plant which will be able to best survive changes in habitat, repotting and other shocks. It should have a healthy colour and luxuriant growth. There should be no missing leaves, leaves with brown edges, or evidence of pruning. Check the stem and both sides of the leaves for disease and pests. Make sure that the soil is not sodden, for if it is the plant may already have or may develop a fatal condition known as root rot. If possible, choose a pot containing more than one plant, which will provide a fuller plant later on. A young plant will get used to its new surroundings more easily than will an older plant, but don't buy a small plant if what you actually want is a tall one--it can take years for a plant to grow to its full height.

Once you have purchased the plant, isolate it from others you may have, in order to protect them from any disease or pests it might have.

The first plant you buy should be relatively hardy and able to tolerate adverse conditions and indifferent care. Some to try would be asparagus ferns, Dieffenbachia, rubber trees and Philodendron. Avoid plants which require specialized care or pampering.

Letters will be answered in Friday's Queen's Journal.

Mom's Menu

Soup's on

Your Mother

Soup is a good hearty meal in cold weather. If it is served with sandwiches or a salad, it will make up the whole meal. It is also a money saver if it is served as the main dish.

Opening a can of soup is easy enough, but if you want to use up leftovers, making your own soup is even more economical than canned soup. This is a good way to get rid of vegetables left over from the previous week and also bones from roast chickens, beef and ham which would otherwise be thrown out. It is possible to buy soup bones. Butchers used to give these away at one time, but like everything else, soup bones now have to be paid for. The price is minimal and about $.40 will buy enough bones for 2 or 3 batches of soup. The base of the soup does not always have to be meat, however. There are many vegetables which make a good thick soup, so bones are not necessary.

The main spices used in soup recipes vary with taste. You can add a few or many, depending on what you like. Experiment and find out what tastes best. You will find some spices are not suited for all soups. Bay leaves affect the flavour of soups very much, and unless you like the taste of bay leaves, you can leave them out of the recipe. I find they take too much from the rest of the ingredients in the soup because of their strong flavour. Beef and chicken boullion cubes can be added to the soup as well, but they will also give it a very strong flavour. This is advisable if there is not enough meat or bones to go into the soup.

Noodles, alphabets, rice or barley added to the soup make it go a little further and also add to the taste.

Crackers and croutons stretch the servings. By croutons, I do not mean to buy a box of them. They are so easy to make, that it is a waste of money to buy them. Just cut several slices of bread into cubes and fry them in margarine until brown.

Home-made soup should be simmered for several hours, but you will find that the time factor is the only drawback because the taste, as compared to that of canned soup, is well worth the wait. Soup can be prepared the night before serving, but it must be refrigerated when it is not cooking because it can go bad very quickly. If properly refrigerated, however, home-made soup will keep for up to t0 days.

Chicken Soup (Preparation time - 4 to 5 hours, makes 2 quarts) chicken carcass (back and neck)

2 quarts water
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
chicken meat diced
t medium onion, diced
2 stalks celery, diced (Leaves also may be chopped finely and added)
2 medium carrots
2 medium potatoes (if desired)
leftover vegetables, drained (turnips, peas, beans, etc. if desired)
1 cup noodles, rice or alphabets savory basil rosemary parsley
t bay leaf (if desired)

Clean all meat off bones. In a 3 quart pot, boil water, bones, salt and pepper for about 2 hours. Remove bones. Add remaining ingredients. For the spices, add a dash of each, taste later and add more if required. Simmer for 2 to 4 hours or until desired taste.

Serve the soup with grilled cheese sandwiches. Butter each slice of bread on one side. With buttered side out, and a piece of cheese between the slices, fry or broil the sandwiches until brown and the cheese is melted.

Grant Concerts

Wind Ensemble

The Music Department of Queen's University will present an admission free band concert in Grant Hall on Wednesday, 11 February, at 8:30 p.m. The fifty-two member Wind Ensemble, under the direction of David C.M Smith will offer a varied program of music written especially for concert band.

The concert opens with the lively "Divertimento for Band" by American born Vincent Persichetti, who is now head of the composition department at Juilliard. This is followed by a first performance of a brand new work by Queen's Music Department's David Keane, "Variations on a theme by Guillaume de Machaut", which, despite the modern sound of the opening section, is unaltered in rhythm and harmony from the original, and attempts to capture, as much as possible, the rich and exotic timbres of the medieval instruments upon which this music was played more than 600 years ago.

"Picasso Suite Sketch" was written in 1969 by Michel LeGrand, (sometimes known as the French equivalent of Henry Mancini) and reflects some of the colour and spirit of Spain found in Picasso's art The "Aegean Festival Overture" - from its first hammering dotted eighth rhythms reveals the Greek origin of its composer, Andreas Makris. The orchestral score was adapted by Major Albert Bader, for performance by the United States Air Force Band.

Interspersed with the selections for full concert band are performances by a woodwind quintet, comprised of flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; and a brass quintet of two trumpets, horn, trombone and tuba. The latter performing a work "Four Movements for Brass" written in 1957 by New England composer Collier Jones: a graduate of the Yale School of Music who divides his time between composing and lobster fishing

This is the last of the two concerts presented this year by Queen's Wind Ensemble, under the direction of David Smith.

McGill Choir

McGill Faculty of Music Concert Choir are giving an admission free concert in Grant Hall, at 8:30 p.m., on Friday, 13 February.

The choir is conducted by Wayne Riddell, Assistant Professor of Music at the Faculty of Music, McGill; Vice-Chairman of the Department of School Music, and Chairman of the Choral Division, Department of Performance. Mr. Riddell is also organist and Director of Music at the Church of St. Andrew and St. Paul (Canada's largest Presbyterian church) and Founder-Director of the Tudor Singers of Montreal, one of Canada's leading choral groups. Organist David MacDonald and pianist Tom Plaunt, both of McGill will provide the accompaniment. Tom Plaunt is a native of Northern Ontario who studied at Toronto's Royal Conservatory and University of Toronto's Victoria College. Aided by a German Government scholarship, he spent five years studying piano and conducting at the Nordwestdeutsche Musikacademie, in Germany, and is currently a Lecturer at the Faculty of Music, McGill.

The seventy voice choir will sing a program covering a variety of musical styles. The first half begins with works by 16th and 17th century composers and the Kyrie, Gloria and Credo from Beethoven's "Mass in C Major" featuring soloists Madeleine Osborne, soprano; Karen Beder, alto; Jerry Glower, tenor and Stephen Lecky, baritone. The second part consists of works by contemporary composers Jean Berger, Ned Rorem and Benjamin Britten.

This concert has been arranged as part of an exchange between the McGill Faculty Concert Choir and Queen's Choral Ensemble, who are to give a performance, under their director, Denise Narcisse-Mair, in McGill's new Concert Hall, on Sunday, March 7, at 3 p.m.

There are many links between the two universities, McGill and Queens, but it is thought that this is the first time they have exchanged a musical event such as this, arranged between the two choirs.

Feeling snowed under? Reading week is coming soon.

Gals walk over York give U of T the blues

Atwood

Toronto, the city, saw the further demise of their teams when the Queen's Golden Basketball Gals battled York and came out ahead 49-39 on Friday. Saturday the Gals ran over the U of T Blues 44-26. The Gals now stand a very solid third in their league and are guaranteed a playoff spot when these four points they picked up this past weekend are added to their existing league points.

The game at York started off very slowly with Queen's gals using their zone defence. It was only when they switched to their full court press that they managed to get the lead out of their shoes. The score at the end of the half was 23-20 with Queen's in the lead by only a slim margin. This score is not really indicative of the game as the shooting percentage for York in the first half was well over 60 percent and for Queen's was well under 20 percent. By the end of the game Queen's had taken a 10 point lead - still not indicative of the game but a bit more respectable.

The top scorer in the game was Kim Headford with 17 points. Penny Wedd scored 8 and Kathy Keely popped in 7 points. The Gals shot 18 for 61 and pulled down only 24 rebounds, against a pretty weak team. This game is further proof that the Queen's Gals tend to play to the calibre of the team which they are playing.

The next day they travelled to the Benson Building to squash the Toronto Blues 44-26. It wasn't a very high scoring game - one of the reasons being that the Gals shooting percentage was very low in the first half again. Kim Headford was high scorer again with 12 points and she also pulled down 11 rebounds. Pat Quigley scored to 10 points and pulled down 10 rebounds. Mary Brunton also put in 10 points.

The final shooting stats show Queen's hitting only 20 for 86. They were very strong on the boards however, pulling down 40 rebounds. The top scorer for Toronto got only 6 points. Queen's was always in control of both games and everybody saw floor time during the weekend.

This young team has developed into a formidable squad which can challenge any of the teams in the OWIAA any day of the week Their one weakness seems to be their shooting and although sometimes their shots roll around the rims - they have a hard time dropping in.

On Saturday Feb. 14 the Golden Gals play Guelph in Bartlett gym at 2:00. If Valentines Day proves kind to them they will be heading into the play-offs against McMaster who is in 2nd spot in the Western Division of the OW presently. Queen's has beaten McMaster once before in this season.

Be sure to come out and support the Gals.

Tuesday night at 8.00 the Hockey Gaels play RMC and the Basketball Gaels play Ryerson.

Men's gymnastics heated

The Men's Gymnastics team competed in a qualifying meet at York this Saturday and was successful in withstanding strong challenges from several championship teams from outside the province.

Our rookie squad arrived at York to compete against teams from Laurentian, York, University of New Brunswick, and the University of Manitoba Additional interest was added by the arrival of the Men's and Women's Olympic teams from both the United States and Canada, who were to compete in a pre-Olympic trial on Saturday night.

After a vigorous and heated competition, the Queen's team came up with a second place team finish. The host York team, Canadian university team champions for the past two years, came out on top, and appears to be headed for another Canadian title. We have high hopes for a good finish to our competitive season, at Western in two weeks, when the final meet is run.

V-Ball Gals top East

The Queen's Women's volleyball team finished its regular schedule at Ottawa this past weekend, undefeated in its East Division play. This marks Queen's most successful season of OWIAA Intercollegiate volleyball competition. The gals in two weekend tournaments went undefeated in ten matches to take Eastern Divison title. As a result the Queen's team advances to the OWIAA Ontario Championship tournament at McMaster February 10-21 in one of the top seeded spots. The winner of that tournament will go to the National Championships.

Having weathered the disappointing loss from the lineup of Cathy Sproul two weeks ago, the gals worked hard with Coach Gallagher to improvise a system which would spread experience and ability evenly on the floor, and again balance the team so that there were three people for each of the specialists slots. This involved two players, Dorothy Cosgrove and Barbara Morrison, learning new positions in short order. Barb Morrison tackled the difficult task of filling Cathy Sproul's shoes with a great effort that paid off this weekend. (It can take months or years to develop a good setter.) Dorothy Cosgrove moved with an apparent ease into her new offensive and defensive roles which would only be suspect to those who know that the split second positioning decisions and different perceptions of a completely new spot on the court can throw one's game off entirely. These two in particular are to be commended

Friday evening, Queen's face York University - a team which has suffered more extensive injuries and misfortunes than others in the league. York with the help of the best setter in the league and lots of spirit gave Queen's a good match, although it was not of the high calibre of their previous meeting. This is evident from the scores 15-6, 3-15, 15-9 which indicate the up and down nature of the play.

Following the York game, Queen's played the up and coming Ottawa U team. The first game was no contest with Queen's easily winning 15-2. Ottawa began to put together some good plays in the second game but fell 15-10 to the more experienced Queen's squad.

The play resumed Saturday morning with the Queen's team somewhat reeling from having shared breakfast with 200 grade seven children who were staying at the same hotel. In any case Carleton was the first opponent; the match was played in the tropical temperatures of Ottawa U's gymnastics gym. Queen's won 15-4, 15-12 as they began to settle into their system.

The remaining matches were against Laurentian and the University of Toronto. These two teams were fighting for third place and thus a position in the Ontario Championships. Both desperately wanted to take a match from the Tricolor squad. It was in these two matches that Queen's played their best - Volleyball of the weekend.

The Laurentian game was typically a hustling, anything comes back, type of affair. This team must be played with determination to put the ball on the floor--either well placed tips or hard line or cross court hits. Queen's did just that taking the match 15-9, 15-10.

Toronto was equally hard put to challenge the gals, succumbing 15-7, 15-9 although they are an extremely tall team

Sue Higgins summarized the weekend effort, "The main factor in our success was our attacking of the service line, at the net and attack blocking."

New found manager Pam Scothorn added that she was exhausted from the excitement, while other team members withheld their comments from the press Coach Gallagher officially was speechless upon victory; however, if you see a lady running around the phys ed building with a pair of broken glasses (hit by a volleyball) and a broad smile on her face, it may be the coach of the OWIAA East Section Champions.

Jock Talk

with Buddy Biceps

Dear Buddy,
I would like your help with a very embarassing problem. After jock class when everyone else is heaving and panting and sweating, I find that I still smell fresh and clean. All the other guys make fun of me because I can't knock out the rats in the change rooms with my armpits like they can. What can I do to smell like a real jock?

Desperate

Dear Desperate.
There's nothing you can do. You are obviously a sissy, or worse, and you don't belong in the same faculty as the rest of the real jocks. Try switching to Pharmacy or Knitting or something.

Dear Budd,
Why does everyone think that jocks are dumb, muscle-bound bullies? In Physiology class, the Nurses always sneer at me and make gorilla noises behind my back and yell "Dumb Jock" whenever I ask a question. I'm NOT a dumb jock; I'm a normal, friendly female who happens to be taking Phys Ed. How can I get them to stop tormenting me?

Discriminated

Dear Discriminated.

Swim Gals Unfortunate

On Saturday the Queen's Swimming Gals travelled to McGill for a coed dual meet. Unfortunately the women lost, mainly due to a large number of McGill divers, most of whom competed on both the 1 and 3 metre boards. Queen's only diver, Mary Lou Faskin, put in a good performance as she placed third on the 1 metre board.

Onee again aeademic pressures prevented the entry of a full team as two of the butterfly specialists, Kate Whitaker and Carol Kennedy, and Back-stroker Heather MacWilliam, were unable to attend. In the 100 breaststroke Cathy Brace set a personal record of 1:15.8, only .7 seconds off the team record.

With the Ontario women's finals being held this weekend at the Queen's pool, this last week's practises will concentrate on starts, turns and other finishing touches. The finals will be run on Friday, February 13 and Saturday, the 14th. Things will get started on Friday morning with the diving preliminaries at 10:00am, the swimming heats starting at 1:30 and the finals at 7pm. On Saturday the swimming heats start first at 10am followed by diving finals in the afternoon and swimming finals at 6:00pm.

Queen's will be playing host to ten other Ontario universities. From observation of meets held during the season, the competition will be very close in several events, and the calibre of swimming and diving high. By a rather complicated placing and point system, various swimmers are chosen from this meet to represent the Ontario conference in the national finals to be held this year in Waterloo in early March. With the home pool advantage, Queen's has several hopefuls for the Ontario team, so come out and give them your support.

Queen's hosts OU-OW ski

Queen's hosted this year's OUAA-OWIAA Alpine Ski Championships this past Friday and Saturday at Mont Ste Marie. The meet was attended by 13 universities for the men and 8 women's teams took part. Races included the giant slalom, slalom, and the combined events.

The overall OWIAA champion was Western followed by Guelph and Toronto. The Queen's Women finished a disappointing 8th due to the lack of a complete team which affected the depth required for team results.

This year's OUAA champion is Toronto, followed by Queen's as a very close second with Western third.

In individual standings, Jill Fuller led the Queen's women, placing 25th in the combined (29th in the Slalom and 8th in the giant slalom). Jane Mcgillvray placed 6th in the slalom, but had bad luck in the giant slalom. Robin McLeod and Stephanie Currie also competed this weekend for the women.

For the men the best Queen's results were from Marc Knowles, who placed 4th in the combined (8th in the slalom, and 6th in the giant slalom). In the slalom, Ian Neilson placed 2nd and Bill Hardman was 15th. In the giant slalom Bruce Cummings finished 4th, Marc Knowles 6th, and Brian Fitzpatrick was 10th. Also competing for Queen's were Tim Wardrop and Doug Christie.

Besides the second place finish for the men, they won the OUSS slalom which gives them their fourth consecutive win which keeps them solidly in first place in the Ontario University Ski Series.

Much credit and thanks is due to Judy Cotton who was the convenor and chief of races for this year's OUAA-OWIAA championships.

Two races remain in the schedule so the Queen's teams are looking forward to continued success.

Queen's captures squash trophy

Kathy Vernon
Last weekend Jan Longhurst, Christa Craig, Sandra Harris, Sheila Patterson and Kathy Vernon represented Queen's in the first Ontario "Under 23" Squash Tournament. It was held on Glendon's squash courts which were both slippery and quite hot. About fifty competitors were entered in the tourney, and many represented other Intercollegiate Squash Teams.

Patterson, Vernon and Craig were defeated in their first matches and thus continued their play in the Consolation Round. Unfortunately, Vernon was rather inconsistent, and she lost out to a Granite Club player who continually pounded low shots into the back corners. Craig played well and managed to win two matches before her defeat in the third round. Patterson carried the Queen's name into the semi-finals, where she played very well although she lost out in the end.

Both Longhurst and Harris handily defeated their opponents through consistent and controlled play in order to continue in the Championship Round. Longhurst played extremely well and managed to come out on top of some very close games, in order to advance as far as the semi-finals. However, it is Harris to whom we say CONGRATULATIONS, for she was not only a finalist, but WON the tournament in scores of 9-1, 9-3 and 10-8 on Sunday She and other Gals will represent Queen's at the McMaster Tournament on February 13-14, the results of which will help decide the O.W.I.A A winners for 1975-76.

Good luck squashers, and here's special thanks to Jan for all of her help on the courts this year.

Fencing Gals go to finals

The Queen's Women's Fencing team is to be congratulated after pulling up their socks and standings this weekend at McGill U.

The team of Deb Christian, Jane Poole, Jo Toms, Miriam Nainis and Sharon Mitchum, placed seeond after Part II of the OWIAA sectionals. The results of Part I had left them in 3rd plaee. From here they will go to Ottawa with Carleton U., the first plaee team, to participate in the OWIAA championships on Feb. 27 and 28.

Three team members will also be participating in the individual competition as well as the team.

Birdmen

Blood and guts flew like spit from a jock's mouth this weekend as the Queen's bad, bad, badminton crew demolished the opposition at "Riotous Ryerson College" in three straight. In the exact words of a horrified onlooker, "The birds flew like bullets!!!"

The end results were RMC 1, Queen's 2, Ryerson 3, and York 4 in the Eastern Divisional Finals.

Cross-country ski convoy trucks on!

This past weekend found the women's and men's X-Country Ski teams competing in the OUAA and OWIAA championships at Webbers near Ottawa. The two teams left Kingston Thursday at noon so that each skier could take a practice run over the 5 km course in preparation for Friday's relay races and Saturday's individual competitions.

Racing for the Gals were Marg Bartlett, Lauren Gallagher, Beth Gilbert, Kit Holmwood, Nansi Kihl, and Gwen McConkey. A seventh team member, Carolyn Broadhurst, was unable to attend the weekend races.

The outcome of Friday's relay races is as follows: 1st U of T, 2nd Trent; 3rd Western A; 4th Queen's; 5th Western B. The relay teams consisted of 3 skiers, each of whom skied a 5 km loop. Queen's was represented by the relay team of Gilbert, Gallagher and Bartlett, who all put forth their best efforts in an attempt to narrow the time difference between 1st and 4th places. Gallagher substituted for Nurse Killer who was forced to remain in Kingston healing several patients on Friday.

On Saturday, the Gals entered the individual ski competition which was held on the same 5 km course as the relays. Susan Rowley of U of T captured 1st place with a time of 26:31 while Martha MacIntyre of Trent came 2nd and Leslie Thompson of U of T took 3rd spot. The top Queen's skier was Bartlett streaking over the finish line in 12th place (29:57). She was closely followed by Kihl in 13th (30:44) and Gilbert in 14th (31:17). Rounding out the participating Queen's individuals were Gallagher, McComky, and Holmwood.

Even though Queen's Gals did not finish on top in the OWIAA championships this weekend they did gain a lot of X country racing experience. The team is composed of rookie racers and the improvement in each Queen's skier's performance in Ottawa indicates a promising future for the recently formed team. The team, established just last year, was the only complete Women's X country team in Ontario. This year, U of T, Trent, and Western have complete teams while Guelph, Waterloo, and York have individual skiers representing these respective universities. Such is the increasing popularity of X-country skiing!

All of the X country ski team have appreciated and benefitted from the coaching and enthusiasms of Anne Turnbull throughout the ski season. Special thanks are extended to coaches Jake Edwards and Anne Turnbull (and their willing assistants) for the well-organized and efficiently run X-country ski meet hosted by Queen's. Last but not least, the Gals wish to acknowledge the endless entertainment provided by the Men's X-country ski team on the past ski trips!

Hockey Gals have frustrating weekend

This past weekend the Women's Hockey team travelled to Toronto for games against York and U of T. Friday evening at 7 the Gals met York in what had to be one of the worst displays of refereeing in the history of Women's Intercollegiate Hockey. Neither official was taking the game seriously, much to the dismay of players and coaches on both benches. Despite the lack of competence on the part of the officials, the Queen's team dominated the game, with play being in the York end for most of the game. The score ended 4-2 in favour of the Gals. The team started to get things together during that game and skated and forechecked better than they had been doing previously.

Saturday afternoon at 3:30 the Gals met U of T at Varsity Arena. The fast pace of the game and end-to-end rushing made it an exciting game to watch but it was more than a little frustrating for both Queen's players and fans alike. The first period ended in a 5-0 lead by the Varsity team. The Gals just could not get a break. They had fallen into their familiar pattern of not shooting enough and not picking the holes when they did shoot. The second period saw a determined Queen's team skate and forecheck and it finally paid off with two quick goals to end the period 5-2. Both goals were scored by a fiery little Frenchman, Anne Symes, known to her teammates as Pepsi.

In the third period the Gals kept trying but just could not close the Gap. The game ended 8-3 with the third Queen's goal scored by Janice Atkinson.

The team as a whole played well with everyone skating and forechecking. Special mention is due to Anee Symes and Atkinson, both of whom played super hockey.

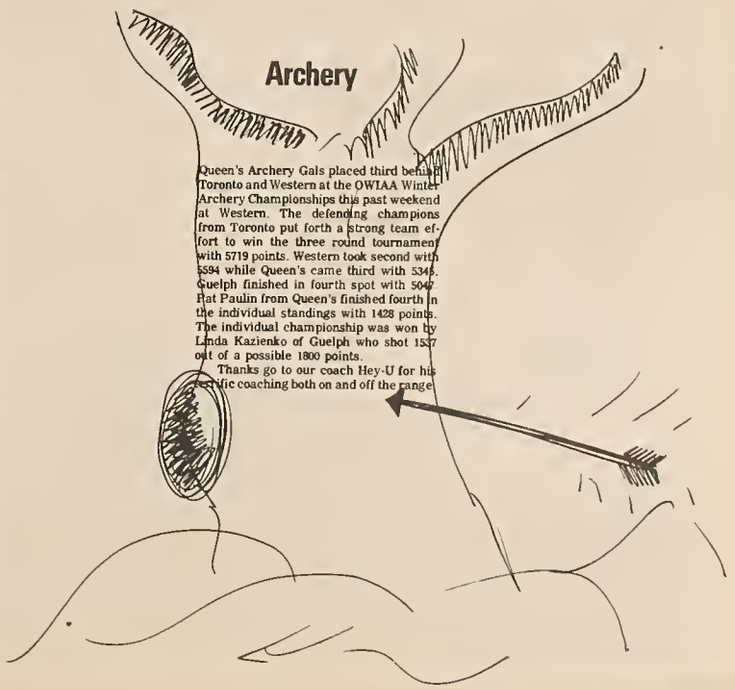
Men's swim

The swimming and diving teams ventured to McGill on Saturday to compete in what proved to be the most exciting dual meet of the season. Unfortunately, despite two record breaking performances and other brilliant efforts, Queen's came up on the short end of a 57-55 combined swimming and diving score.



The first record breaking swim was by John Ireland who swam the 1000 yard freestyle in 11:13.2 bettering his old Queen's record by a couple of seconds. Ireland had a good day, swimming four gruelling individual events; besides winning the 1000 free he also picked up three second place finishes in the 500 freestyle, the 200 I.M. and the 200 backstroke.

Team star Tim Dennis showed his usual excellence by cruising to easy victories in the 200 I.M. and 100 breaststroke. John Pearson led the way to a 1.2 finish in the 100 yard butterfly with Bruce Ripley coming second. Pearson also came second in the 200 yard freestyle while Ripley also easily won the 200 yard backstroke. Rodger Cassidy contributed valuable points with third place finishes in the 200 and 500 yard freestyle events establishing a personal best time in the 500. Ken Davies came second in the 100 freestyle and third in the 50 freestyle sprint while Joe Schnittker won an exciting dual for third in the 1000 freestyle. Marty Demmers, Andreas Cordsen and John Scheulderman all had respectable performances on fine efforts. The foursome of Ripley, Dennis, Pearson and Davies won the medley relay but in the final race, the 400 freestyle, the 400 freestyle relay, despite setting another Queen's record, the same foursome was forced to take an extremely close second to McGill.

Down in the diving end of the pool, our divers showed a lot of talent and gave gallant efforts but unfortunately were outclassed by some excellent McGill divers. Fred Kallin picked up thirds in both the 1 and 2 metre events. Cheered on by an appreciative crowd, our other divers, Kerry Powell, Rob Laing and Mary Lou Faskin (who was competing for the women's team) gave impressive performances.

Special credit must go to Rob Stoddart who has come on in late season to coach the swim team and has done an excellent job. The swim team has a dual meet against Laval in Quebec City this weekend.

Archery

Queen's Archery Gals placed third behind Toronto and Western at the OWIAA Winter Archery Championships this past weekend at Western. The defending champions from Toronto put forth a strong team effort to win the three round tournament with 5719 points. Western took second with 5594 while Queen's came third with 5345. Guelph finished in fourth spot with 5047. Pat Paulin from Queen's finished fourth in the individual standings with 1428 points. The individual championship was won by Linda Kazienko of Guelph who shot 1537 out of a possible 1800 points.

Thanks go to our coach Hey-U for his terrific coaching both on and off the range.

Strike 2, honoraria

For the second time this year Queen's students have opened their pocketbooks and increased their student interest fees. On last Wednesday's and Thursday's referendum students voted in favour of increasing their contribution to Bus-it by $.85, giving CFRC $.25 to finance Queen's Athletic activities coverage, increasing their contribution to Legal Aid by $.50 and Tricolor by $1.50. This would seem to indicate that the students of Queen's University place a high priority on the services they enjoy and are willing to pay a premium price for them. It is interesting to note also that on the same referendum, all proposed increases in honoraria for various members of the student administration and related services were defeated.

With one hand the students are donating money left and right to maintain their present services and with the other hand they are neglecting acknowledgement of the people who provide these services by turning down the request for an increase in honoraria.

It takes a minimum of 40 hours of time per week to be on the executive of the AMS, or the editor of the Journal or the director of the Queen's Entertainment Agency. Because of the time burden, many benefits are foregone. It should be well understood that when you assume these posts that you cannot typically progress in your academics at a normal rate. The inevitable result is that one has to stay for Intersession and-or Summer School, thereby limiting one's summer earning power. Consequently we severely restrict the number of qualified candidates eligible for AMS positions on monetary grounds.

We strongly feel that honoraria will have to be raised soon for the sake of 'Universal Accessibility'. Any capable student should have the opportunity to do extra-curricular work of interest to him or her, regardless of financial resources. Each year that the increases are denied, the posts become further removed from the means of those of us who can't afford to assume the attached costs.

Jean store "rebate-sale" rip off

Dear Editors,

Recently a local jean store advertised in "sale" and when I pointed out the date on the coupon (it was valid until the 31st of January) she asked for advice from her boss who told me I could only have one rebate but when I objected and told him that you have advertised both of these rebates, he dismissed the conversation with "nobody is perfect."

the Golden Words that if any of its readers bring with them the coupon published in the ad they would get a $2.00 rebate on any article worth over $10.00. I would like to tell all readers about my experience and the fact that some ads can be misleading and false.

I went to this store on Saturday the 31st and there was a "sale" going on whereby they were offering a "rebate" of $2.00. I selected a pair of jeans and noticed that it was priced for $18.95, while the same brand of jeans, in the same store and approximately the same size was priced for $17.95 on the 8th of January when I had accompanied my sister-in-law to buy for her a pair of jeans. I thought that with the sale and this special coupon that I have, I would end up paying $14.95 so I decided to buy it. But I was wrong in thinking so - as the lady at the counter first told me that the coupon was not valid because of the Later I heard their ad on the radio urging people to hurry up for the $2.00 "rebate-sale". I guess there is not much honesty left in the business world if all a "sale" or "rebate" means is marking prices up to knock them down in the presence of the consumer, to give the consumer a pleasurable feeling when being ripped off. Is there nothing in the code of ethics of business that classifies such "rebates" and "sales" as dishonest or is it an accepted fact of life in North America.

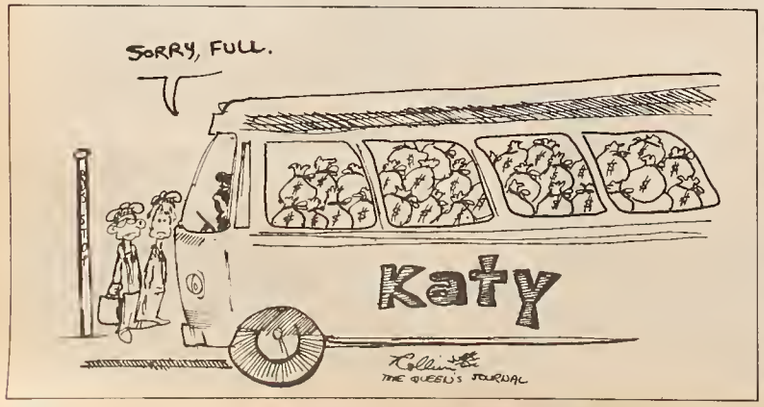
Post-elections analysis

John Bottomley

As many people know, there was a bogus team running for president this year: The Associatelessts. Their purpose was not just to ridicule the AMS, but to find out what Queen's students thought of their government.

A few things became apparent during the campaign itself. The bogus party got all 250 of its needed nominating names in only five hours, on the afternoon the nominations closed. This, I think, is a positive sign. It shows that anyone who wants to can run, but getting such a joke team nominated so easily seems to have some serious implications. It indicates either that students consider the AMS as a joke, or that they just don't care, or that they are unhappy with what we have. This last, as the election results showed, is probably the case.

One problem was encountered in our campaign. When our nomination form was handed in we were told that there might be a problem with it. The matter went to the AMS Chief Justice, and a decision was made. It turned out that we were invalidated, but we were never told of the decision. We were never able to appeal the ruling. Had we been serious candidates, there could have been some real trouble here. One has to wonder whether the court or the executive would have treated a serious team using psuedonyms in the same manner. A definite snag in the nominating process.



When the election was over, a lot of other things were clear. A plea for write-in votes for the Associatelessts garnered only two votes. It seems that those students who voted took the election seriously, assuming they knew about the write-in campaign.

The whole analysis is written on the premise that responsibility and interest is good; a premise which backs most arguments but which is never acknowledged. This seems an obvious statement, but it is important nonetheless. It means that I am ignoring the possibility that the whole concept of AMS student government is a joke. Perhaps it is.

Indeed, great dissatisfaction with the present mamby-pamby style of government was indicated this year, both in letters to the Journal and in the nearly 20 percent vote for the Socialist Slate. This feeling in the students is a far more pressing mandate for the Avis team than their 1669 votes were, and is something they should keep in mind for the next year.

Merely continuing the present course of government will likely mean the virtual end of the AMS. It was not created to push paper and juggle books. It began as an organization to protect and work for students, and was a vital element at Queen's. A little more effort in this direction would be welcome. Note that protecting "rights" is not the only aspect of this function. The AMS should also be working to improve the learning environment here.

In spite of the relatively high turnout, I think that confidence in the AMS is not much increased. The Executive cannot afford to get cocky or feel that the government is safe and well loved by the whole student body. There is still a lot of work to be done to make the AMS worthwhile. Not credible, worthwhile. If it is worthwhile it will have its credibility; the sacred god to which far too many institutions bow. This is not a time to relax, nor is the AMS riding on any crest of popularity. The heavy vote for the Socialists has presented the AMS and Executive with a strong challenge, and if it is not taken up the AMS might be in big trouble

Watts denies rumor

Principal Watts was "somewhat concerned" about rumours that the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) had accepted a recommendation that tuition be raised by 25 percent.

The principal insisted that the rumours were false. The report which drew publicity was from a sub-committee of COU which made many recommendations, one of which was to increase tuition by 25 percent over two or three years.

When brought before the council, COU firmly rejected the report; "it has been thrown back" for revision, said Principal Watts.

Parrott

Fiscal gap must close

Reynolds & Gherson

"Simply...the fiscal gap must close." Such was the crux of Dr. Parrott's message to 200 students and faculty at what was variously termed an "open forum" and "bear pit session" in Ellis Auditorium last Tuesday.

Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, pointed out that the fiscal gap, the discrepancy between expenditure and revenues, had been escalating rapidly such that whereas in 1969 the debt represented 10 percent of government expenditure, by 1973 it was double that figure. This translated into a $20 billion deficit.

According to Parrott the government has set out to reverse this trend, which if allowed to continue could erode the province's financial situation "immeasurably". Moreover it is costing the Ontario taxpayers dearly to finance this debt. Therefore the government has imposed a 10 percent ceiling on its expenditure increase. Given an expected increase in revenue of 14 percent, progress in the right direction might be made

He explained that whereas the colleges and universities appear to have done better than other sectors - such as transportation, health care etc. - having received an additional 14 percent in operating grants, one must recognize the considerable growth of post-secondary education beneficiaries, both last year and before.

Following this general overview of the government's financial position, Parrott proceeded to look briefly at the financial cutbacks, faced by universities. In doing so he considered them "a fact of life - something we must live with."

He reminded the audience of the government's "ongoing committment" toward post secondary education and pledged to carry on with programs for the future" although in a manner reflecting "more direct sense," than had been the government's custom during the affluent 60's.

When asked where his priorities lie in the trade-off between accessibility and the quality of education, Harry Parrott stated that he would have to come down on the side of quality, Parrot was quick to point out that he felt "trapped on the issue" and that the universities can have the best of both worlds, "but not if we act independently of each other."

Parrott hinted that as a result of the trade-off between accessibility and quallty of education, class sizes might increase.

This suggestion was one of the few concrete responses made by Parrott. The theme trade-offs betwecn accessibility and quality of education continued to crop up. Dr. Beal of the Electrical Engineering department gave what was possibly the best analysis of the condition when he informed the Minister that "You are not going to win on this issue of accessibility and quality of education." Dr. Beal noted that there would be no real decline in quality in the short term but eventually the declining standards of the libraries, equipment and other university capital expenditure would force the quality of education downwards.

Parrott replied with his familiar argument that there was little to be done in light of the government deficits. Parrott

Padre: reorder priorities

Ross Bartlett

"The simple fact of the matter is that it will take a lot of money and more. It will take a reordering of our priorities."

This is the assessment of University Chaplain, Padre A.M. Laverty, in addressing himself to the topic: "Environmental quality. Who's Responsible? What's the Cost". This was the fourth in the "Future of Man" lunch hour series, on Tuesday.

Laverty stated that "there's general agreement. That where there's life there's pollution. We can't eliminate it but we can control it." And not only can we control pollution but we can do it in such a way as "to produce the general good."

The problem is that "there has never been a life-style more productive of pollution than that of the late twentieth century." The reason for this is our dependence on technology and urban centres. "Three-quarters of Canadians live on one-quarter of the land mass...on a strip glued to the American frontier." But we can achieve a better environmental standard.

Dealing with only once source of pollution, that of emissions into the air from stationary sources, it is difficult to calculate the costs of meeting proposed and existing standards of pollution control. It is estimated that it will cost "six and a half billion dollars by 1980," in the United Sates. If Canadian industry is taken arbitrarily as being one-thirteenth that of the U.S. then the "cost in Canada will be a half-billion dollars."

"In essence, global pollution requires a global solution." Quoting Jaques Cousteau, the Padre said, "the only thing industry refuses really is to be paralyzed in a competitive world. Industry would welcome global standards imposing global restrictions for air and water pollution."

Laverty outlined four guidelines for environmental control. "The amenities of life" belong to all equally, "health, mental and physical, shall not be knowingly or carelessly destroyed without extreme exceptions," and the "life support capabilities" of the Earth shall not be harmed.

But "the reordering of the life-style is a moral decision" and there are moral issues to be decided.

In response to the question of how you get people involved, Laverty replied that "as Albert Swietzer said, "example is not the main thing in influencing people, it's the only thing." The import of "one single man on fire can be phenomenal." No disembodied idea is any good. Robert Oppenheimer, the great physicist, once replied to the following question, "How do you get the idea to bite and hold?" in this way: "Padre, you have to wrap it up in a person."

Regarding the establishment of global standards, Laverty replied that the fact that the "United Nations is far more successful in non-military operations rather than military" must be recognized and used. We must perceive the "needs of some countries, over the desires of others." The only person you can do anything about, is yourself "--the only discipline we accept is the one we cook up for ourselves," and it better be on the basis of principles that will last.

"Man can overcome self-interest," Laverty claims, "and he is not beyond redemption. I don't think people are inevitably dominated by self-interest. Human nature is bracketed in two phrases--blood brother to the beasts--and a little less than the angels, and I have some hope of man getting closer to angels."

Canadians, "need to be less casual. We need to feel other's problems under our skins. I think our human difficulties come not from not knowing what the difficulties are, or how to cope with them, but a weakness of will, both individually and corporately."

Dave Gordon explains to Journal Editor Dan McClelland how the present cooking facilities are to be renovated to make a thorough-fare to the new dining room.

A peek inside University Centre

Catherine Black

It won't be long now. By September, from beneath the billowing plastic and canvas, a new University Centre will emerge. Gerald McCahill, Director of Physical Plant at Queen's, said that the new pub may even be open by May.

On Tuesday the University Centre Committee, the Press and interested students had an early-bird look at the three floor addition to the Student Union Building. McCahill led the tour. The new facilities will include a sidewalk cafe, the Bank of Montreal, three dining rooms and two pubs. The main pub in the basement will hold four hundred students. Although only a vast room with dusty pipes and cement blocks was visible, Ian Nordheimer, President of AMS, said that according to the architect black paint will transform the ceiling pipes into decorative objects. At one end of the room will be a stage and at the other, a long refrigerator room for beer. For those wondering what it will be like drinking so far underground, be assured that the ventilation is quite adequate. If you want a quiet chat with a prof over a beer there is the McLaughlin Room, which is being converted into a pub.

Light streaming from a large skylight makes the main dining room the most impressive room so far. Wallace Hall will not be useable as a dining hall for much longer and all the kitchen facilities will be moved into the new centre, where there is also a small dining room. Food for the centre will be cooked in the new kitchens, except the baked goods which will come from Ban Righ.

Work goes on in the new University Centre.

Challenge for ecology: apply the knowledge

Barb Nyland

"Ecologists have a big burden placed on their shoulders. They are always asked for solutions to environmental problems, but ecology, which as a study is about 80 years old, was not set up to solve those problems."

This was the comment of Dr. Robert Ricklefs when questioned by the Journal about the direct applicability of his studies of the ecology and energetics of reproduction in birds. Ricklefs emphasized that a large body of theoretical knowledge is needed before direct applications can be made.

Dr. Ricklefs, an ecologist from the University of Pennsylvania and Dr. Stephen Emlen, a behavioralist from Cornell University visited Queen's this week.

Ricklef's major lecture concerned growth patterns in birds but he also spoke about his secondary interest, the evolutionary patterns of island birds. An understanding of the way in which mainland birds change their permanent residence to islands should be considered when natural parks are being designed, he feels.

Dr. Emlen's research concerns animal behavior. His lectures concerned sexual selection in the bullfrog and the advantages of communal living for a type of swallow whose nests are excavations grouped together in the side of a cliff.

Emlen spoke with the Journal concerning the ways in which sociobiology, now an area of great controversy, could be applied to human beings.

Part of the controversy occurs between those people who believe that behavior in animals, including man, has a genetic basis and the group to which Emlen belongs, who feel that behavior will change with differing environmental stimulae.

Models generated from the observation of bird behaviour have been applied to eskimos and an amazing corelation has been found said Emlen. Settlement location and group size appear to be determined by the best way of hunting. It has been observed that a change in hunting methods has caused changes in demographic characteristics.

"Human spinoffs are not the reason why scientists are usually concerned with these studies," cautioned Emlen but his hypotheses in this area have led him to a number of controversial subjects. He stated that some female birds have developed strategies for testing the quality of their potential mate. Hence he feels that a female desiring children should be very careful in assessing the quality of the male she mates with. He says that a woman "is locked into a three year energy commitment to the offspring and it will be easier for her if the male takes a strong role after birth." He admitted that there were many other factors involved in human mating but the ideas caused a stir when they were presented at a seminar concerning women's liberation at Cornell.

National student paper

Ottawa (CUP) — The Student Advocate, a new national paper, may soon appear on campuses across the country if student councils agree.

The Student Advocate will not carry ads and will depend on the help of student councils for distributing. The paper is a joint project of the National Union of Students and the provincial and regional organizations, the only product of recent talks between the three groups.

The focus of the first issue will be the student mobilization against the financial cutbacks and aid policies. For the remainder of the year, student councils will have to buy, in bulk, the four page tabloid.

The paper will appear simultaneously as Le Partisan Etudiant on francophone and bilingual campuses.

Vacancies available on Senate committees

Vacancies will be available starting September 1, 1976 on numerous Senate committees.

Any faculty member or student is invited to submit to the Secretary of the Senate the names of those who seem to qualify by virtue of interests, knowledge and experience. Nominees need not be members of Senate, but should have special interest in the areas dealt with by these committees.

Application forms are available in the Senate Office and should be returned before 5p.m. on Friday, February 27th, 1976. Any questions may be answered at the Senate Office.

Jobs for Canadians

(CUP) Manpower and Immigration Minister Robert Andras announced in late January that discussion will shortly be started with the provinces "on the ways and means of insuring that Canadian postgraduates receive fair consideration for university teaching positions."

Andras said his concern is "jobs for Canadian residents" and that immigration policy can be used to achieve this objective.

He noted in his statement that the influx of university teachers from abroad occurred with the rapid expansion of the universities a decade ago, when there were insufficient numbers of Canadian graduates available to fill teaching vacancies.

But his concern "is that Canada may now have a surplus of post-graduates." Andras pointed out that he could take unilateral action to control the admission of foreign academics, but rejected this approach "because while we (the federal government) are responsible for the admission of persons into Canada, the provinces are responsible for education."

Don Savage, executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) said in an interview that he finds Andras' statement "rather vague." CAUT, he said, plans to meet with Andras later this month "to find out what he meant by the statement."

Savage said CAUT would prefer to see universities set up their own review committees to consider appointments of foreign academics rather than government involvement.

He said the CAUT policy is that a foreign academic should have "substantially better" qualifications to receive an appointment than Canadian applicants for the same position.

Spicer speaks at Queen's

Speaking at Queen's University on Monday, Keith Spicer said that Canadian universities should be denounced for not requiring French as a prerequisite. Spicer, federal commissioner of official languages, said that universities should be promoting French in the high schools. Citing a wider choice of options, Spicer claims that there has been a decline of 21 percent in the number of French students.

The real villains are the administrators who are more interested in obtaining large numbers of students for larger finances. Spicer recommends that French and English be the "basic baggage of high school graduates" when they enter post-secondary education.

Bus to train: yes or no?

A bus service from the downtown Kingston area to the CN station may be instituted if enough support is shown from Queen's students, AMS President Ian Nordheimer stated after attending a meeting of Kingston City Council's Transportation Committee. The current proposal is that the Public Utilities Commission run a bus service on Fridays for the noon trains.

A similar bus service was run daily by the PUC from the Kingston Shopping Centre to the station last term and the early part of this term but was discontinued due to insufficient use. Nordheimer stated that the Transportation Committee "is willing to try it again" but requested that the AMS get an indication of the amount of use the service would get from Queen's students.

The questionnaire included below is important, according to Nordheimer, if the service is to be implemented. Nordheimer urges all students to either complete the questionnaire and send it to the AMS office in the Student's Union or call 547-6165. Clip out and return:

Would you utilize a bus service to the CN station to meet the noon train on Fridays at a cost of $ .50 plus a student card?

continually referred to series of charts showing how well the government is doing in subsidizing universities in light of the increasing deficit. Parrott pointed out that over 20 percent of provincial expenditures go to pay off interest on the government's outstanding debt.

Ian Nordheimer, AMS president, asked Parrott if the universities were suffering because, "Bill Davis and his boys screwed up." Parrott replied by referring to the financial management in his ministry. He pointed out that 98 percent of the Ministry's budget goes to the institutions.

Parrott's most specific answer was in response to Bruce Trotter's question regarding the $6 million that the province owes Queen's for Mac-Corry. "Trotter asked if the government would pay the $6 million and if they would also pay the interest on the sum. Parrott's reply was "no." Parrott did, however, state that there would be a favourable announcement in the budget statement to be made at the end of March. But as for the full $6 million plus interest, "no way."

Election errors why no apology

Dear Editors,
I don't question the fact that the entire Journal staff must have put a lot of hard work into the special election issue of last Tuesday.

I don't question the fact that with so many candidates running for so many different positions in the recent elections, it must have been very difficult to keep everything straight.

What I do question is this: that the Journal did not apologize for some simple mistakes in the election issue, specifically the candidate who was running for Commerce President and was placed under "Junior AMS Rep" (which he was not even eligible for anyway), and the candidate who was running for Commerce Athletic stick and was sentenced to doom because the Journal said his opponent was "Acclaimed."

They seem to be honest mistakes - why were there no apologies in Friday's Journal?

One thing further: why was there no reply to the charges levied at the Journal by Golden Words?

I hope we see answers to all the questions raised over this election. I would not want the fine reputation of the Queen's Journal to be questioned as well.

Harry S. Binks
